

SIR WILLIAM MAITLAND,

OF LETHINGTON.

THIS was the eminent person whom Camden, and several other writers, in treating of the affairs of Scotland in his time, designate by the appellation of "Lidington," a corruption of "Lethington," the denomination of his estate, by which, according to the usage of his country, he was commonly called. In an age when his native realm was not more distinguished by bravery in war than by ignorance of the arts of government, he stood alone a most profound and subtle politician. He was the eldest son of Sir Richard Maitland, of Lethington, by Mary, daughter of Sir Thomas Craustoun, and was heir to a large patrimony; but the peculiar character of his mind unfitted him for the enjoyment not only of the simple comforts but of the proudest distinctions of private life. Stratagem and secrecy were the darling objects of his study, nor was ambition wanting to spur him on to the constant exertion of those inclinations. He had appeared at an early age in the court of the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise, widow of James the Fifth, where he gave such proofs of his talents for the management of public affairs, that in 1558 she chose him for her principal secretary. It was towards the close of that year that she declared her resolution to oppose the progress of the Reformation in Scotland, and in the winter of the following, Maitland, who, in addition to being a protestant, had disgusted her by contradicting the counsels of the French by whom she was sur-

Ε 14220

1288

Biography

MOOKHTAR-OOL-MOOLK

Sir Salar Jung Bahadoor G. C. S. I.

BOHN'S ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY.

LODGE'S PORTRAITS.

PORTRAITS
ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONAGES

Great Britain.

WITH
BIOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL MEMOIRS OF THEIR LIVES AND ACTIONS.

EDMUND LODGE, ESQ., F. S. A.

IN EIGHT VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

LONDON:
HENRY G. BOHN, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.
MDCCCLXII.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

1. MARY, QUEEN OF ENGLAND Holbein 1538
From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Exeter, at Burghley House .

- WILLIAM, FIRST LORD PAGET Holbein 1563
From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Angleson, at Bonaventure.

3. EDWARD, FIRST LORD NORTH 1564
From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Guildford, at Wroton Abbey.

4. HENRY STUART, LORD DARNLEY, KING OF SCOTLAND. 1567
From the Original, in the Collection of the ■■■■■ of Seaforth, at Brahan ■■■■■

- JAMES STUART, EARL OF MURRAY, REGENT OF SCOTLAND 1570
From the Collection at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh.

6. JOHN KNOX 1572
From the Original, in Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh.

7. THOMAS HOWARD, FOURTH DUKE OF NORFOLK . . 1572
From the Collection of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, at Arundel Castle.

CONTENTS.

- | | | |
|---|---------|------|
| ■ WILLIAM POWLETT, MARQUIS ■ WINCHESTER | Holbein | 1572 |
| From the Collection of his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, at Northumberland House. | | |
| 9. SIR WILLIAM MATHLAND, OF LETHINGTON . . . | | 1573 |
| From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Lauderdale, at Thirlestane Castle. | | |
| 10. ■■■■ HAMILTON, EARL ■■ ARBAN, DUKE ■■ CHA-
■■■■■■■■■■ ■■■■ | | 1574 |
| From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Hamilton, at Hamilton Palace. | | |
| 11. MATTHEW PARKER, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY . | | 1575 |
| From ■■■■ of His ■■■■ the Archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth Palace. | | |
| 12. WALTER DEVEREUX, EARL OF ESSEX | | 1576 |
| From the Collection of the Right Honourable Lord Bagot, at Blythfield. | | |
| 13. SIR NICHOLAS BACON Zucchero | | 1579 |
| From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Bedford, at Woburn Abbey. | | |
| 14. SIR THOMAS GREHAM Holbein | | 1579 |
| From the Collection in Mercer's Hall, London. | | |
| 15. ■■■■ FITZALAN, EARL OF ARUNDEL . ■■■■ | | 1580 |
| From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Bath, at Longleat. | | |
| 16. JAMES DOUGLAS, EARL OF MORTON | | 1581 |
| From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Morton, at Dalmeaky. | | |

CONTENTS.

17. THOMAS RADCLYFFE, EARL OF [REDACTED] Sir A. [REDACTED] 1588
From the Collection of Wm. Radclyffe, Esq.

18. [REDACTED] CLINTON, EARL OF LINCOLN . . . [REDACTED]
*From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Bedford,
at Woburn Abbey.*

19. [REDACTED] PHILIP SIDNEY . . . Sir A. Mors 1588
*From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Bedford,
at Woburn Abbey.*

- [REDACTED] MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTLAND . . . 1587
From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Morton, at Dalnashay.

21. ROBERT DUDLEY, EARL OF LEICESTER . . . 1588
From the Collection of the Most Noble [REDACTED] Marquis of Salisbury, [REDACTED] Hatfield.

22. AMBROSE DUDLEY, EARL OF WARWICK . . . 1590
From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Salisbury, at Hatfield.

23. [REDACTED] FRANCIS WALSHINGHAM . . . [REDACTED]
From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Devon, at Kewale.

24. SIR CHRISTOPHER HATTON Kest [REDACTED]
From the Collection of the Right Honourable Viscount Dillon, at Ditchley.

25. CARDINAL ALLEN [REDACTED]
From the Collection of Browne Montyn, Esq., at Kid-dington.

CONTENTS.

26. FRANCIS DRAKE 1585
From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Latham, at Newbattle Abbey.
27. PHILIP HOWARD, EARL OF
From the Collection of His Grace the Duke of Norfolk, at Norfolk House.
28. JOHN, FIRST LORD MANTLAND, OF THIRLESTANE
From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Louderdale, at Thirlestane Castle.
29. WILLIAM CECIL, LORD BURGHLEY M. Howard
From the Collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Exeter, at Burghley House.
30. ROBERT DEVEREUX, EARL OF ESSEX 1601
From the Collection of the Right Honourable the Earl of Verulam, at Greshambury.

QUEEN MARY.

THE history of this Princess, who, it is scarcely necessary to say, was the daughter of Henry the Eighth by Catherine of Arragon, and his first-born child, lies within a very narrow compass. Her reign was short, and undistinguished by any remarkable feature, either of her state policy or military fortune, from which the fame of Monarchs is usually derived. Her private life was yet more barren of circumstance, and her character has remained wholly unknown to us. It then have been unfair or rash to conclude, to use a very but homely phrase, that she had no character at all? Surely we might have reasonably argued that had she possessed any remarkable quality of mind, or shone in any acquired accomplishment, the facts could scarcely have been concealed from us; the deserts of princes want recorders; and her friends and partizans, who then covered more than the face of Europe, had, in addition to all ordinary motives to celebrate her, the powerful incentive of a party spirit the most active and heated, because it was founded in religious zeal. Nor could we have been answered to those remarks that their opponents, who at least equalled them in fury, would certainly not have omitted to publish to the world her deficiencies, for the rejoinder was ready—that doubtless they would, had they been able, but that to them she was unknown and inaccessible. To all this might be fairly added that a living author, of the Catholic Faith, who to every other merit as a historian adds that of perfect candour, inferentially admits the justice ■ ■ ■ supposed view ■ her by confining his report of her qualifications to the remarks ■ ■ ■ "she understood the Italian, ■ ■ ■ spoke the French ■ ■ ■ Spanish languages, knew the Latin, and played well on the lute and monochord," without ■ ■ ■ adverting to her natural talents. These negative presumptions against her, which, in combination, have always ■ ■ ■ on my ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ those of most others the effect of proof, have been in a moment dispersed and overthrown by two documents in the very recent publication of "Original Letters" from the British Museum. It ■ ■ ■ such evidence only ■ ■ ■ the truth ■ ■ ■ history becomes undeniable.

Since the death of her father, incessant efforts had been made, in the name of the young Edward, to induce her to the Protestant profession. It was at length determined to deal sternly with her, and on ■ ■ ■ twenty-eighth of August, 1551, she having ■ ■ ■ days before addressed to her brother a letter of denial, perhaps in ■ ■ ■ respects the best epistolary relique extant of the age and land in which she lived, three Privy Counsellors, with the Chancellor Rich ■ ■ ■ their head, waited on her at her House of Copthall in Essex, once more ■ ■ ■ argue with her, and, if she continued refractory, to signify to her the King's resolution to prohibit the Mass in her family, and to dismiss her priests, as he had already such of the lay officers of her household ■ ■ ■ had refused to conform. We have, in the very curious collection in question, not only the letter just ■ ■ ■ alluded to, but the narrative composed by those ministers, at great length, and with minute exactness, of their conversation with her, for the inspection of the King in Council on their return; a conversation in which, alone ■ ■ ■ unaided, ■ ■ ■ had to contend with three experienced ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ a subject of ■ ■ ■ others ■ ■ ■ most important ■ ■ ■ her estimation to her present welfare, and to her future hopes.

They commenced by delivering to her ■ ■ ■ letter from ■ ■ ■ brother, which she knelt ■ ■ ■ receive, and kissed. "I ■ ■ ■ it," said she, "for [redacted] honour [redacted] King's Majesty's hand, and not for the matter contained in it, for that I take to proceed [redacted] Majesty, [redacted] from you [redacted] Council." On silently reading it, struck, as it [redacted] seem, by some particular [redacted] she remarked sarcastically, "if [redacted] herself, "Ah! good Mr. Cecil took much pains here." On the Chancellor's beginning to open their instructions, she desired him to [redacted] short, "for," said she, "I am not well [redacted] ease, and I will [redacted] you a short answer." He proceeded [redacted] apprise her of the privations to which it [redacted] intended [redacted] subject her, and [redacted] about to inform her who were the counsellors present when the resolutions to [redacted] effect were made; but she stopped him short, saying, "I care not for any rehearsal of their [redacted] I know you [redacted] to be of [redacted] therein." Then, having warmly declared her utter obedience and submission to the King, saving her conscience, she added "when the King's Majesty shall come to such years that he may be able to judge these things himself, his Majesty shall find me ready to obey his orders in religion; but now, in these years, although he, good sweet King, have [redacted] knowledge than any other of his years, yet it is not possible that he [redacted] be [redacted] judge of these things: for if ships were to be sent to the sea, [redacted] any other thing to be done touching the policy and government [redacted] realm, I am sure you would not think his High- [redacted] yet able [redacted] consider what were to be done, and much less [redacted] he in these years discern what is [redacted] in matters of divinity." After much [redacted] conversation on minor points, in which [redacted] used the [redacted] caution and vivacity in her replies, the Chancellor turned the discourse [redacted] the Emperor, to whom she insisted that a promise had been given for her freedom in religion, of which she cited particular proofs, which being controverted by Rich, she became warm, and said, "I have the Emperor's hand testifying that [redacted] promise was made, which I believe better [redacted] [redacted] you of the Council; [redacted] though you esteem [redacted] Emperor, yet should you show more favour to me for my father's sake, who made the more part of you almost of nothing." They then proposed to send some one to supply the place of Sir Robert Rochester, the comptroller of her household, and ■■■ the officers of whom they had deprived her; ■■■ she answered ■■■ ■■■ would appoint her own officers, and if any such man were left there, ■■■ would "go out of her gates," for they two would not dwell in one house. She ■■■ after left them, having first, again on her knees, delivered to ■■■ Chancellor a ring for Edward, and they proceeded to give several strict orders to her chaplains, and others about her, and, when in the court, ■■■ their departure, Mary called them to a window, and desired them to procure the return of her comptroller; "for," said she, "since his departing I take ■■■ accounts myself of my expenses, and have learned how many loaves of bread be made of a bushel of wheat; and I wis my father and my mother never brought me up with boking ■■■ brewing; and, to be plain with you, I am weary of mine office; and therefore if my Lords will send mine officer home, they will do me pleasure; otherwise, if they will send him to prison, I beahrew him if he go not to it merrily, and with a good will; and I pray God to send you ■■■ do well in your souls and bodies too, for ■■■ of you have but weak bodies."

Having meant to give incontrovertible proof that the powers of her mind and understanding were of ■■■ ordinary class, I forbear ■■■ insert the letter which preceded this conversation, because it ■■■ possible, ■■■ probable, that ■■■ might have been largely assisted in the composition of it, ■■■ that it might have been wholly the work of another pen. It is needless to observe that verbal communication admits of ■■■ such doubt, and for the genuineness of the Chancellor's ■■■ rative, ■■■ have the books of ■■■ Privy Council, ■■■ which ■■■ original is recorded. It is then ascertained that Mary possessed prudence, presence of mind, quickness of apprehension, acute feelings, and an undaunted courage; and that she joined to them extensive powers of expression, ■■■ ■■■ lofty sense ■■■ dignity of her station. What then, when her persecution ■■■■ ceased, and she had mounted an almost absolute throne, intervened to ■■■■ the exercise of ■■■■ faculties; to render the whole of her reign inglorious, ■■■■ insignificant; and herself, were it not for one lamentable class of exceptions, a cypher in history? Simply an attachment to ■■■■ faith in which her mother ■■■■ sedulously bred her, so constant, ■■■■ ardent, so exclusive, as to engross every passion and sentiment, and to cast ■■■■ impervious veil over her true character. But I have perhaps dwelt ■■■■ long on this discussion. It is at ■■■■ events time ■■■■ glance at the most important parts of the story of her public life.

Mary's reign, historically speaking, commenced on the death of her brother, Edward, on the sixth of July, 1553, but, ■■■■ the shadow of ephemeral authority which ■■■■ been ■■■■ on Jane Grey, by her ■■■■ and Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, and the circumstances which produced ■■■■ rise and fall, have been so lately and largely treated of in the Memoirs respectively appropriated in this work to those three eminent persons, it will perhaps be better to refer the reader to those Memoirs than to trouble him with an imperfect repetition of ■■■■ substance ■■■■ them in this place. Those great events occupied scarcely a month, at the ■■■■ of which, Mary triumphantly entered London, and may be said ■■■■ have mounted the throne. She had made no secret of her intention ■■■■ ■■■■ the ancient religion, and the nation therefore, however chagrined, ■■■■ not disappointed when they ■■■■ the Catholic Prelates, the chief of whom had been long prisoners, not only restored to freedom, ■■■■ so their respective sees. ■■■■ these, Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, a ■■■■ whose character has been ■■■■ disguised amidst the furious contention of parties as to leave us nothing certain but that he possessed consummate sagacity, was appointed to the custody of the Great Seal, and chosen by the Queen as her most ■■■■ ■■■■ minister. In the ■■■■ time she regulated her ■■■■ duct in ■■■■ ■■■■ of high importance by ■■■■ advice ■■■■ her

■ kinsman the Emperor Charles the Fifth, to whose interference on her behalf he had been much indebted during her late sufferings, and who now granted his good offices with increased alacrity in furtherance of ■ view which he ■ conceived of obtaining her hand for his son Philip of Spain. Mary, from policy, ■ well ■ ■ to her sister Elizabeth, had resolved, and from the hour of her accession declared, her resolution ■ marry. On whom she should fix her choice had been already the subject of frequent deliberation in her Council. Several foreign Princes had been proposed, and, of her countrymen, Cardinal Pole, who it happened ■ not been debarred by priest's orders, and the ■ of the attainted Marys of Exeter, the young Edward Courtenay, whom ■ her arrival in London, she had created Earl of Devonshire, and towards whom she had long manifested an evident partiality. Pole ■ rejected on the ■ of his too advanced age, and Courtenay is said to have lost her favour through the irregularity of his private life. Previously to these discussions she had secretly solicited the opinion of the Emperor on this important question, and before they had terminated, received his answer, recommending his son, whom she agreed ■ accept. He advised her also to proceed in the restoration of the old religion with cautious and gentle steps, but here unhappily she was less compliant.

She had however hitherto done ■ very material public act to that effect, though the reformers had imprudently offered her a pretext by assaulting in the pulpit ■ of her chaplains who narrowly escaped with ■ ■ ■ forbearance however ■ but of short duration. Six bishops ■ thrown into prison for impugning the revived Church, and among them the Primate Cranmer, and Ridley, both of whom it is true ■ added to ■ offence their ■ endea- ■ in favour of ■ ■ of Jane Grey. ■ Princess Elizabeth, ■ whose firmness in the reformed ■ ■ Protestants ■ built their ■ hopes, now ■ abandon it, and ■ received into ■ regal favour. The meeting of

Mary's first Parliament was distinguished by the celebration of high Mass before both Houses; their addresses were filled with acknowledgments of the Queen's piety, and their first enactments were a unanimous declaration of the Queen's legitimacy; the annulment of the divorce of her father and mother; and a law for the resumption of divine service as used at the time of the death of Henry the Eighth. The marriage of priests was again declared unlawful, and a visitation appointed to enforce the prescribed mode of worship. The return to the church of Rome might therefore be esteemed nearly complete in England but the acknowledgment of the Pope's supremacy, a faculty less likely to be so readily conceded either by Prince or people. In the mean time the negotiations for the royal marriage proceeded slowly, and were encountered at every step by adversaries, foreign as well as domestic. The English, in their dread of the rule of a stranger Prince, forgot for a while their religious dissensions, and many of Mary's most zealous friends, even in her Council, with Gardiner at their head, strongly opposed the match, while Henry the Second of France, the inveterate rival of the Emperor, used the most subtle agents to intrigue against it in London. The House of Commons voted an address, beseeching her to prefer an English consort, but her determination was unalterable, and it is said, that on the same evening she sent secretly for the Imperial Ambassador into her private oratory, and in his presence affianced herself to Philip at the foot of the Altar. Shortly after, she dissolved the Parliament.

The public announcement of the marriage, which followed, was the signal for that extensive, but ill planned and worse executed enterprise known by the name of Wyatt's insurrection. Whether it was undertaken with Elizabeth's knowledge is one among many mysterious questions which it involved, and which will probably never be satisfactorily answered. Certain, however, it is, that she was suspected, imprisoned, closely questioned on it, and that the Queen thenceforward withdrew almost all appearance of kindness. to have been spared from a public trial the intercession of Gardiner.

A Parliament now called, which proved pleasant than its predecessor. ratified without scruple the treaty for the Queen's marriage, rejected almost other proposed by the ministers, among which for enabling the Queen to dispose of the Crown by her will; for the revival the dreaded Six Articles; and ancient laws against the Lollards. Mary therefore dissolved it the of one month, and prepared with much anxiety arrival consort, who, after long apparently necessary delays, arrived, and was received by her with a fondness which it became evident irksome to him. He was presently followed by Pole, the character of Legate; another Parliament; and the reconciliation to the of Rome was consummated by a number of laws, the most important of which was for the restoration to the Pope of the ecclesiastical supremacy. It had been contemplated to re-invest the Church with the of which it had been deprived by the Reformation, and the proposal would have been made to this Parliament but for the prudence of Gardiner.

The Queen seemed nearly to have attained height of her wishes, and, to crown her satisfaction, imagined herself pregnant. Her consort, deficient in genuine tenderness, used present towards her that scrupulous attention which in highly persons so nearly resembles that only the most refined sentiment can make the distinction. He had successfully courted popularity by several acts of beneficence, particular by procuring the release of Elizabeth from confinement, and the prejudices against him seemed gradually away. Mary, however, was not yet content. She had the misfortune to live in an age when the cruel punishment of offenders against any mode of faith which acquired a distinct denomination to have been considered by ■ professors of that ■ as a religious duty, ■ all agreed in inflicting it. Her temper, too, which ■ not to have been ■ the best, ■ perhaps somewhat disposed ■ revenge, ■ reformers ■ not spared provocation. ■ unhappily determined to put into execution some penal laws with which her ■ Parliament had lately armed her. Of her two ■ counsellors in ecclesiastical affairs, Pole is said ■ have ■ Gardiner ■ have urged her forward. A persecution, truly ■ called, of the Protestants ensued, from the detail of which, as it is perhaps ■ generally known than ■ of any other prominent part of our history, I wholly forbear, observing only that in its progress two hundred and seventy-seven persons of various ranks, among whom five ■ bishops, ■ reckoned to have perished ■ the stake, not to mention multitudes who were punished by fine, imprisonment, or confiscation.

Mary's supposed pregnancy now proved to be ■ than ■ manifestation of disease, and her consequent vexation ■ aggravated by the immediate departure for Flanders of Philip, whom she had for some months past with difficulty persuaded ■ remain with her till after her expected delivery. Her affection for him was so extravagant ■ ■ seemed but to increase in proportion to his growing indifference, of which she ■ ■ frequent proofs. The celebrated resignation of his father ■ this precise period had made him the ■ powerful and wealthy monarch in Europe, but, instead ■ imparting to her any share of ■ advantages, he suffered her to fall into necessities, and to disgrace herself by acts of rapacity for relief. ■ ■ neglected her most trifling requests, and seldom deigned ■ the courtesy ■ replying ■ her fond letters. The ■ of Gardiner, not long after Philip left her, ■ up ■ measure of her chagrin, and ■ into a deep melancholy. ■ had however ■ strength of mind enough ■ struggle faintly against it. ■ plunged ■ public business: ■ requests of ■ commons, which were either refused, or granted only in part ; and dis-

another Parliament. re-established and endowed several religious houses, devoted herself with increased to the restoration her religion. A plot to depose her, and to place Elizabeth on the throne, was now discovered, and two of the conspirators officers of household of Princess Elizabeth, once more in danger, again saved by the interference of Philip, to whom, since the recent marriage of the Dauphin to Mary Queen of Scots, who stood next to her in to English Crown, her life had become peculiarly valuable. The King of France, who had included Mary in his hatred to Spain, discovered to have been privy to this conspiracy, well as to schemes by Mary's self-banished Protestant subjects, for surprising some of the English garrisons on the French coast, and to a late impotent invasion by them the coast of Yorkshire. Philip, long desirous to chastise him, took the advantage of his consort's irritation at these injuries to persuade her to join him in a war against France, and for that purpose made her once more a visit, which she been long vainly soliciting.

Mary and her Council readily agreed to the proposal. A powerful English fleet presently ranged itself on the French coast, and thousand men, under the command of the Earl of Pembroke, were despatched to join Philip's army, which in the very opening of the campaign, gained the signal victory of St. Quentin, where the celebrated old Constable Montmorency, who commanded in chief, and many other of prime nobility of France, into the hands of the conquerors. This event so unexpected, and, many accounts, so important, that the received Paris only with deep regret, but even with terror. Great exertions made to prepare capital itself for attack, and King despatched orders the Duke of Guise to return instantly from Italy, with army which he commanded. He came, and exacted from Mary a heavy retribution indeed for the share which she had taken in the infliction of late disgrace his country. By a series of artifices, planned and executed with the profound military skill of his time, he enabled the French to appear most unexpectedly before Calais, while a number of ships which were cruising on the coast, apparently for the purpose of watching the motions of the English fleet, collected together at an appointed time, and attacked it on that side. Military history has few examples of a surprise at so sudden and so successful; and thus the fortress was lost to England in eight days, in the depth of winter, that important fortress, with its valuable dependencies, which she had held for two centuries, not less to the gratification of her national pride than to the service of her public interests.

Mary, who had been long afflicted with dropsy, was gradually sinking when this sad event happened. It afflicted her most severely, and is said to have hastened her dissolution. Her report, however, probably derived from the well-known observation which she uttered on her death-bed, that her last words opened, the word "Calais" would be found written on her heart, for she survived till the seventeenth of November, 1558, ten days after the occurrence of this misfortune.

7

12 13 14 15

WILLIAM, LORD PAGET.

His character of this eminent statesman was drawn, about sixty years after his death, by a writer who sometimes sacrificed the sacred veracity of biography to his love of that forcible and terse method of expression in which he excelled, and whom therefore I never quote, unless his assertions be supported by the genuine evidence of history. "His education," says Lloyd, "was better than his birth, his knowledge higher than his education, his parts above his knowledge, and his experience beyond his parts. A general learning furnished him for travel, and travel seasoned him for employment. His masterpiece was an inward observation of other men, and an exact knowledge of himself. He dealt with state, yet insinuating; his discourse free, but weighed; his apprehension quick, but stayed; he was ready and present mind keeping its possession of thoughts and expressions even with the occasion and the emergency; neither was his carriage more stiff and uncompliant than his soul." The eulogist might have added, without hazard of contradiction, that a simple and honest minister had existed.

He owed nothing to the influence either of ancestry or wealth, but rose from a very private family in Staffordshire, from whence his father, a native of Wednesbury, his county, migrated to London, and obtained there the office of Serjeant at Mace in the corporation. William, his son, the subject of this memoir, was born in the city in 1506, he commenced his education in St. Paul's school, under the celebrated Lilly, from whence he was removed to Trinity Hall, Cambridge. In his early period of his life, the foundation of his future eminence was laid. By some means, long since forgotten, he became known to Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, perhaps only the scholar, as well as the acute statesman of his time, but a zealous cultivator also of those elegant literature which were then little professed in England. He was received into the family of the prelate, and, after a time, under his auspices to complete his education in the University of Paris, from whence he returned again to the Bishop's house. Bred under the wing of Gardiner, it is strange he should have contracted a strong attachment to the ancient faith of his country. He practised it, under all the extraordinary varieties of its fortune which distinguished his time, with inflexible constancy, but with a mildness and moderation towards his opponents which was the goodness of his heart.

In 1530, then but at the age of twenty-four, the King, doubtless through the recommendation of Gardiner, sent him into France, to collect the opinions of the most learned experienced jurists of that kingdom on the great question of the proposed divorce, and rewarded him on his return with the appointment of a Clerk of the Signet, which was afterwards confirmed to him for his life. He seems to have been otherwise employed in 1537, when he was despatched with great privacy, into Germany, to foment the discord which then existed between the Emperor and the Protestant Princes, and to endeavour to persuade them to refer their disputes to the mediation of Henry, and the King of France. In 1540 the offices of Clerk of the Privy Council, and Clerk of the Signet, were conferred on him, as after that he was Clerk of the Parliament for life; in the following year he was sent ambassador into France; and in 1543, in which year he was knighted, was appointed one of the two principal Secretaries of State. His distinguished skill, however, in foreign diplomacy confined him chiefly to line of public service during the remainder of Henry's reign. In the summer of 1545 he negotiated, in concert with Chancellor Wriothesley, the Duke of Suffolk, the marriage of the Princess Margaret to Matthew Stuart, of Lenox, and many other important relative to Scotland, and after joined in mission with the Earl of Hertford to manage that treaty with France, which for the time rendered fruitless by French King's positive demand of restitution of Boulogne. In the succeeding June, however, the peace was concluded, chiefly under his direction. Henry, who survived that important act but for a few months, appointed William Paget an executor to his Will, and of the council to his minor

The strict intimacy and confidence in which he had long lived with the Earl of Hertford, uncle to the young King, and Protector of him, and of the realm, opened to him a new channel of favour. He chosen a Knight of the Garter at Edward's accession, and after resigned his office of Secretary of State, and was appointed comptroller of the Royal Household, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster: a singular exchange, which may probably ascribe to the inconvenient interruptions to the duties of a Secretary of which must have arisen from frequent nomination to foreign missions. In fact despatched within very few months to the Emperor, in the character of Ambassador Extraordinary, to persuade that Prince to join in an alliance against France, and, though the negotiation wholly failed, left that court with a splendor of general reputation which perhaps no other foreign minister in any time enjoyed. Of this we have abundant proof in the letters of Philip Hoby, then resident Ambassador there, extracts from which may be found in Strype's Memorials; and Lloyd, the writer lately quoted, tells us that Charles "once cried, in a rapture, that he deserved to be a king, as well as to represent;" and, one day, as he came to court, "yonder is the

I deny nothing to" A short extract from one of letters to Protector during his embassy, which preserved the Harleian MSS, it lets us somewhat the character of his mind, seems to prove that he could not have purchased much of his favour at the court of Brussels by flattery. After having recited much large former conferences with Emperor's ministers, he says—

"—The day following d'Arras, accompanied w^t Maunce, to my lodging, and, albeit the day before somewhat moved, yet, hoping they brought resolution, I quieted myself, and after salutations, wordes of office, I beganne to give ear what they wolde say, when sodainly d'Arras, after a great circumstance, and many goodly painted wordes, entred th' excuse of my longe abode here w^out answere to my charge, w^h he affirmed was occasioned by th' Emp^r's busines aboute the Prince's swearing in thies townes, and pruned us therefore on his Ma^{ty}'s behalf, to take patience untill his coming to Brasseles, when, without faile, he said I sholde be dispatched W^h when I hearde, and p^roceeding, in steade of the resoluc^on and answer that I looked for, to be only fed w^h faine wordes, I must confesse unto yo^r Grace I colde not keepe patience, but, being entred somewhat into coler, answered him that I was now here at th' Emp^r's will and com^{mand}ment. He might stay as long as it liked him, and dispatche when he liste. But, q^d I, I once home, I knowe that neither the King's w^old sende hither, nor I, for my part, to wyne a hundieth thousande come againe aboute one like matter, considering how coldly the hitherto proceeded, and suerly I am that either ye sholde judge me so voide of wit that I colde not perceave wherunto this chuldish tendeth, me to suppose you so much w^out considerac^on as thinke I colde be brought to beleve that the Prince's ing colde be one delay to answering of thies things, that I am come hither for, a matter easy enough to be perceived such had one experience of the wolde, etc.

Hereunto d'Armas very coldly answered, that, in good faythe, the [REDACTED] of my staye, whatsoever I thought, [REDACTED] onely [REDACTED] he had shewed me, and therefore praied [REDACTED] conceive any other opinion ; for I assure you, q^d he, the Emp^r beareth the King, his good brother, as muche affec^{on} as if [REDACTED] were his sonn, and wolde gladly ayde and assiste him in all things to [REDACTED] uttermost that he maye conveniently : But, q^d he, thies [REDACTED] are weightie, [REDACTED] require to be answered unto w^t deliberac^{on}. Yf thei seemed [REDACTED] weightie unto you as ye speak, q^d I, I cannot judge but ye wolde on this time have spied out some time to answer unto them ; and, as for th^e Emp^r's assistance, my M^r requyrethe it not siné other waise then shall appere to be requisite and beneficial for both parties ; and therefore, if the occasion of this long dely be uppon siné other considerac^{on} then ye have yet declared unto us, I wolde wishe ye delte like frendes, and opened the same frankely : and I knowe, q^d I, that thies matters were concluded before Mons^r G.'s departure, w^{ch} maketh me more [REDACTED] muse why ye sholde so long stay from making reoport of yo^r answers," &c.

On his return from [REDACTED] he was called by writ to the House of Peers, by the title of Baron Paget, of Beaudesert, in Staffordshire, and [REDACTED] immediately after appointed a commissioner to treat for the accommodation of [REDACTED] differences which had arisen between England and France. [REDACTED] the feud between the Protector and Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, which had long divided Edward's court and council, had [REDACTED] risen to [REDACTED] height, and the former sunk under the boldness and [REDACTED] artifice of [REDACTED] mighty adversary. Lord Paget necessarily, for such was the custom of the time, shared in the misfortune of his friend. He [REDACTED] committed to the Fleet Prison on the twenty-first of October, 1551, and some weeks after removed to [REDACTED] Tower, where he remained a prisoner, without a cause assigned, for five months, [REDACTED] the end [REDACTED] which [REDACTED] was divested of the Order of [REDACTED] Garter, [REDACTED] ground of insufficiency of [REDACTED] ; charged with corruption [REDACTED] embezzlement in his [REDACTED] of [REDACTED] Duchy ; and sentenced in the Star-chamber to a sum of six thousand pounds. These severities were another object to terrify the small party of the Protector's party into obedience till his power. The Duke of Northumberland should be firmly ; for in December, 1552, Lord Paget obtained a general pardon, with exception only of debts to the King, which was inserted but to his appearances, for it was the fine with which he had been most unjustly charged almost wholly remitted. It remained, however, to Mary to him the Garter, which was done with great ceremony, at a chapter of the order held at St. James's, on the twenty-seventh of September, 1553, weeks after she mounted the throne ; when it appears to have been for the first time admitted, certainly to the honour of the order, that no objection on the score of birth ought to be allowed to supersede the claims of transcendent personal merit.

Mary, indeed, could not but have been prompted to favour him, equally by her interests and her prejudices. He had appeared among the first to assert her disputed title to the throne, and had hastened to her presence to give her the earliest notice of her having been proclaimed Queen in London. He had been persecuted by her bitterest enemies, and distinguished by the most steadfast adherence to that faith the maintenance of which was unhappily the first object of her life. He received him into her utmost confidence. He was appointed to manage the treaty of her marriage with Philip of Spain ; was sent Ambassador, immediately after, to the Emperor his father, to agitate certain points tending to the re-establishment of the papal authority in England ; and, after his return, was appointed Lord Privy Seal. Though a warm advocate for the Spanish match, which indeed had been chiefly planned by himself and his old friend Gardiner, he entertained a becoming jealousy of Philip, and expressed it, when necessary, with a frankness and honourable frankness. The Prince, who undoubtedly was by marrying Mary to make himself master of England, had applied to the Parliament, when she was supposed to be pregnant, for an act to constitute him Regent ■ the ■■■■ should be of age to govern ; and proposed to give security for his surrender of the Regency when that period might arrive. The motion, which ■■■■ been largely debated in ■■■■ House of Peers, ■■■■ likely to ■■■■ carried, when Lord Paget suddenly rose, and said, " Pray who shall ■■■■ the King's bond ? " These few words changed the temper of the House, and it was negatived.

On the accession of Elizabeth, he withdrew himself voluntarily from ■■■■ public service. That Princess, says Camden, " entertained an affection and value for him, though he ■■■■ ■■■■ strict zealot of the Romish Church." After six years of retirement, he died ■■■■ the ninth of June, 1563, and was buried, according to the direction of his will, at Drayton, in Middlesex. Fuller, who is frequently incorrect, informs ■■■■ that he ■■■■ very aged, but the inscription ■■■■ ■■■■ superb ■■■■ erected to his memory in Lichfield Cathedral, which was destroyed in the general wreck of the interior of that church in the grand rebellion, states, according to ■■■■ copy preserved in the family of Hatton, that he died in his fiftieth year.

Lord Paget married Anne, daughter and heir of Henry Preston, a descendant of the house of Preston, of Preston in Yorkshire, by whom he had four sons, and six daughters. Henry, the eldest, died without issue, having only for five years enjoyed his father's dignity and estates, which then fell to Thomas, the second son, lineal ancestor of the present Earl of Uxbridge. That nobleman, together with his next brother, Charles, ■■■■ deeply engaged in the ■■■■ of the Queen of Scots, and ■■■■ attainted in 1587, and restored by James, immediately ■■■■ his accession. Edward, ■■■■ fourth son, died young. For the daughters, Etheldreda ■■■■ ■■■■ married to Sir Christopher Allen ; Joan, to ■■■■ Thomas Kitson ; Anne, to Sir Henry Lee ; Eleanor, first to Jerome Palmer, secondly to Sir Rowland Clerk ; Dorothy, to Thomas, ■■■■ son of Sir Henry Willoughby, of Wollaton, in Nottinghamshire ; and Griel, first to ■■■■ ■■■■ Rivet, and then ■■■■ Sir William Waldegrave.

EDWARD, FIRST LORD NORTH.

EDWARD NORTH, the founder of a house in which it is difficult to find a single individual undistinguished by wisdom or wit, or stained by any memorable fault or error, was the only son of Roger North, a younger brother of a respectable family, which had seated itself in the reign of Edward the fourth at Walkingham, in Nottinghamshire, by Christian, daughter of Richard Warcup, of Seonington, in Kent, and was born about the year 1496. He lost his father, who was in a mercantile profession, and seemed to have been an inhabitant of London, in 1509, and, probably because he was too young to follow the same calling, was placed in a course of studies to qualify him for the practice of the law, which he finished at Peter-house in the University of Cambridge. He soon acquired a considerable reputation at the bar, and was appointed, while yet a very young man, advocate for the city of London. It is very likely that his interest with that corporation might have been forwarded by an Alderman of the ward of Wilkinson, who had married one of his sisters; and still more probable that he was introduced to the ministers of Henry the eighth by Thomas Burnet, Auditor of the Exchequer, who was the brother of another. However this might have been, it is certain that in 1534 he was made one of the two joint Clerks of the Parliament, and then of such respectability that it was frequently so in that reign by some of the first rank in public employment. Four years afterwards he attained the station of one of the King's Sergeants at law; in 1312 resigned his clerkship of the Parliament, and was appointed Treasurer of the Court of Augmentations; and in the following year was knighted, and elected a representative for the county of Cambridge.

The Court of Augmentations was a temporary establishment instituted upon the dissolution of religious houses, and was so named from the augmentation of the income of the Crown by the assumption of their property, of all matters concerned in which it was under the superintendence. The most consummate integrity, and the most vigilant application, were requisite in those who were to receive suddenly this enormous influx of various wealth, and to methodise and direct a new system of revenue. For the performance of these duties Henry chose Sir Edward North, and in 1313 nominated him to the office of Chancellor of that Court, jointly with Sir Richard Rich, whose resignation, a few months after, the sole jurisdiction devolved on him. He was called to the Privy Council, and distinguished by a degree of favour and confidence enjoyed by very few of Henry's servants in those years of caprice and cruelty which closed that Prince's reign. Indeed his character and temper seem to have well qualified him to deal with the extravagances of such a master, for his prudence was perhaps of the sort usually called worldly wisdom, and his compliance approached to servility; but his faults appear to have been the consequences rather of a timid than a pusillanimous disposition, since there is good reason to believe that his public conduct was eminently disinterested, and his honesty was not only unimpeached, but unsuspected. If his conscience been less nice, or his nature more daring, he might have amassed immense wealth: he contented himself however with the fair emoluments of his office, and with grants, comparatively to no great amount, of abbey lands. Henry left him a final token of esteem by appointing him one of the executors of his will, and a counsellor to the infant Edward.

In the short reign of that Prince, he remained a wary and passive observer of the party contests by which it ■■■ agitated ; ■■■ when the King's death produced ■ crisis in ■■■ ■■■ of his degree could stand neuter, he espoused the pretensions to the Crown which had been forced on ■■ unfortunate Jane Grey, and ■■■ one of the Privy Counsellors who signed ■ letter to Mary, declaring their allegiance to her unwilling rival. For ■■■ ■■■ of policy, however, long since forgotten, Mary, on her accession to the throne, ■■■ only received him into her Privy Council, but on the ■■■■ ■■■■ of February, 1553, O. S. the first year of her reign, summoned him to Parliament, by the title of Baron North of Kirtling, now called Callage, in the county of Cambridge, which till that period he ■■■ continued to represent in the House of Commons. In this and the following reigns we find him also rather in the character of a courtier than ■ statesman. That Elizabeth held him in some degree of favour is proved by her having conferred ■■ him, in her second year, the office of Lord Lieutenant of Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, but she employed him in no other public capacity.

He was ■■■ verging on old age, and in declining health. On the twentieth of March, 1564, O. S. he made his will, and here, as in all the rest, left abundant proof of the caution which ■■■■ to have been the leading feature of his character, by the creation of ■■ entail, equally remarkable, considering the custom of his time in such matters, for its strictness and extent ; for the terms in which it is expressed ; and for his exhortations to his heir "to beware of pride, and prodigal expences." The same spirit directed him in matrimonial choice. His first wife, whom he married when a young man, ■■■ the widow of two husbands, but very wealthy ; Alice, daughter of Oliver Squyer, of Southby, in Hampshire, who had been first married to Edward, ■■■ of Sir John Myrfin, ■■ Alderman of London, and, secondly, to John Brigadin, of Southampton : ■■■ second, who survived him ■■■ 1575, ■■■ ■■■ in her ■■■■ widowhood ; Margaret, daughter of Richard Butler, of London ; who, ■■■ ■■■ informed by her epitaph in the chancel of ■ Laurence Jewry, ■ been successively wife to Andrew Francis; Robert Chartay, an Alderman; and ■ David Brooke, Lord ■ Baron of the Exchequer. By her ■ ■ ■ issue; but his ■ Lady brought him two sons, and two daughters: Roger, ■ successor, a nobleman of distinguished high spirit and bravery; ■ Thomas, who ■ bred a lawyer, but is better remembered ■ the translator of Plutarch's Lives, Guevara's Horologium Principum, and ■ other literary labours. The daughters ■ Christian, married to William Somerset, third Earl of Worcester; and Mary, to Henry, ■ Scroope, of Bolton Lord North died, ■ his house in ■ Charter-house, London, on the thirty-first of December, 1864, and was buried in the chancel of the parish Church of Kirtling, or Catlage.

Some account of the ■ of ■ nobleman was written, "sensibly, and in ■ good style," as Lord Orford observes, and published by his great-great-grandson, Dudley, fourth Lord North. From that small work, which is composed with the pardonable partiality of ■ descendant, I will give a short extract, which points to the portrait here engraved, and furnishes some circumstances which ought to have ■ place in this memoir. "By his picture," says Dudley, "whereof there ■ yet a copy remaining, he appears to have been a person of ■ moderate stature, somewhat inclined to corpulency, and ■ hair. As to his character, it ■ only appear from what has been said of him; and his letters shew he rather affected the delivery of ■ ■ and clear sense, than any curiosity of style or expression. The bravery of his mind may ■ best judged of by his delight to live in ■ equipage rather above than under his condition and degree; and by ■ magnificence in buildings, which ■ very noble for materials and workman-ship, as may appear by the two houses ■ set up at Kirtling ■ Charter-house. ■ piety, charity, and love of learning, is evident from his bestowing the parsonage of Burwell on ■ University of Cambridge, ■ the vicarage at Barwell; at Peter-house, an ancient College of that University, as a token of gratitude for what he gathered there in the way of learning, the parsonage of Ellington. He provided chapels in such houses he built, which shows a desire in him of an assiduity in the service of God by himself and family; which care of providing peculiar places for divine service within families was much neglected in the following age, as may be witnessed by many great stately houses then built. He also built a chapel for the interment of his posterity, adjoining to the south part of the chancel in Kirtling Church; for, though the main superstition was expired, yet burials in those days were attended with the performance of much religious duty."

HENRY STUART,
(LORD DARNLEY,)
KING OF SCOTLAND.

It would be impertinent, especially in such a work as this, to endeavour to treat the story of this weak and insignificant young man's life with historical or political exactness. All the public importance which belonged to him fell on him by reflexion, and, although he was the first cause of several great events, he was an active instrument in none. Suddenly raised to an empty regal title by a passion which did not deserve the name of love; doted on, despised; the object at once of idolatry, and of fear and jealousy; without judgment to ward off the dangers with which the perverse course of his fate surrounded him, and without temper to bear the contempt to which the imbecility of his character exposed him; as he was without merit, so he fell unpitied, and, but for collateral circumstances, would have been long since wholly forgotten.

Henry was of royal descent, and nearly enough related both to Elizabeth and Mary to awaken and justify the caution and vigilance of each. His father was Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lennox; his mother, Margaret, daughter to Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, by Queen Margaret, sister of Henry the Eighth, who married that nobleman soon after the death of her first husband, James the Fourth of Scotland. Lennox, when a young man, had been compelled to take refuge in the Court of Henry by the fury of the Hamilton faction, from whose head, the Duke of Chatellerault, he ■ attempted to wrest the regency of Scotland in the early infancy of Mary. ■ illustrious ■ which he made there, and the distractions of his own country, where ■ ■ attainted, had ■ ■ for many years in England, and there ■ ■ son, Henry, ■ born and educated. Elizabeth, on her accession, found ■ distinguished family quietly seated in her dominions, ■ treated them with an urbanity and respect ■ the motives to which her policy ■ regard ■ Scotland ■ ■ overlooked. The prime object of that policy ■ the period of which we are about to speak, ■ the prevention of the marriage of Mary, and she pursued it with the dissimulation and artifice which invariably marked her ■ duct towards that unhappy Princess. She affected to press for it, ■ with anxiety, and, among those whom she proposed to Mary, ■ worthy of her hand, ■ Lord Darnley, for by that title, one of ■ father's, Henry ■ then designated.

Mary had long endeavoured, and very prudently, to gain the friendship of the family of Lennox : she lent, therefore, ■ willing ■ to this recommendation. Lennox and his ■ obtained Elizabeth's permission to visit Scotland, and in the month of February, 1565, waited ■ Mary, then ■ a progress in the shire of Fife, at Wemyss. ■ had ■ before seen Darnley. ■ ■ in the twenty-first year of his age ; ■ pattern of masculine beauty both in face ■ person, and ■ accomplished to perfection in ■ the niceties of artificial politeness. She beheld him in the instant with all the infatuation ■ ■ doting lover ; determined almost ■ suddenly to give ■ her hand ; and presently intimated to her Court ■ resolution ■ which her conduct towards the youthful stranger had already in some ■ apprised them. The match however ■ delayed by various circumstances. Elizabeth ■ opposed it even with fury ; despatched ■ mandate for Darnley's instant return ; ■ chastised his disobedience ■ ■ by seizing his father's English estates, and imprisoning ■ mother ■■■ brother, who ■■■ remained in London. The ■■■ powerful among ■■■ protestant Peers of Scotland, ■■■ her incitement, conspired to ■■■ themselves by violence ■■■ person; were discovered; ■■■ into England ■■■ a military force. It was necessary too to ■■■ the approbation of the main body of the Scottish nobility, and some time was lost in their deliberations, and much ■■■ in ■■■ result of them—the sending ■■■ Rome for ■■■ dispensation, ■■■ parties being within ■■■ prohibited degrees of kindred. These obstacles however were finally removed, and ■■■ twenty-eighth or twenty-ninth of July they were married, ■■■ on the following day publicly proclaimed, by the styles of Henry and Mary, King and Queen of Scotland.

Mary, deeply enamoured ■■■ she was, could not have been wholly insensible of Darnley's defects. It is ■■■ possible that the very contemplation of them increased her anxiety to hasten her marriage. Determined at all events to possess him, she dreaded perhaps that himself might prevent it by some act of folly or violence too gross to admit of extenuation, and suffered herself to be deluded by the ■■■ of her passion into the vanity of believing that her influence in the joint relations of a Queen, a wife, and a lover, might in future restrain such ■■■ He had already fallen into serious ■■■ Several of the prime nobility had been disgusted by his insolent anticipation of the airs of royalty; he ■■■ joined a faction against the Earl of Murray, Mary's illegitimate brother, and the leader of the ■■■ reformers, whose good-will it ■■■ peculiarly important to him to cultivate; and in ■■■ time had disgraced himself by forming a strict intimacy with Mary's secretary for French affairs, the Italian Rizzio, ■■■ of mean birth and habits, whom her imprudent favour had rendered ■■■ object of indignant jealousy ■■■ the Court, ■■■ as of popular hatred; ■■■ had betrayed ■■■ temper ■■■ ferocious, ■■■ drawing ■■■ dagger on ■■■ nobleman ■■■ to apprise ■■■ the Queen, in order to temporise with Elizabeth, wished ■■■ defer for a while ■■■ creation of Duke of Albany, a royal title to which she raised him shortly before their marriage.

The short civil which, at the instigation of Elizabeth, exiled protestant Peers returned to raise, presently the nuptials. with Henry's barren story beyond the simple fact that he was the incidental and passive of it. Mary's complete success in of it afforded him a triumph the House Hamilton, the ancient enemies of family, peculiarly gratifying to such a mind as his; and when the Duke of Chatelherault, who had been among the subdued malcontents, humbly sued for a pardon, he opposed it with furious vehemence, and prevailed on the Queen to qualify it by compelling the Duke to reside in France. Mary's descension in this, and other affairs, served but to increase his desire of powers which he incapable to wield. They had been married scarcely three months when he beset her with incessant importunities that he might be declared to possess the Crown Matrimonial, an obscure phrase peculiar to the Scottish regal law, which denoted however a degree of authority nearly co-ordinate with that of the reigning princess. This it not in Mary's power confer but jointly with the Parliament, the consent which it would have been dangerous to ask, yet he could the disappointment. Domestic quarrels followed. neglected her person; avoided her society; into unbecoming vices, while insuperable anger which flows peculiarly from ill-requited love took possession of her breast, and it was only her contempt of his weakness that spared him from her pure hatred. The short space of seven months sufficed to produce consummate this of contrary passions in the of Mary.

King, unable to act, or at least to think, for himself, soon inconvenience of commotions. He sought for advice, or rather for support, in the counsels of Rizzio, was by cold remonstrances on his own misconduct.

[REDACTED] great [REDACTED] of craft [REDACTED] necessary to induce that foreigner to adopt a course [REDACTED] generally reasonable, [REDACTED] as so evidently [REDACTED] to the maintenance [REDACTED] [REDACTED] interests. Henry however conceived the most rancorous enmity towards him, [REDACTED] presently found himself unexpectedly at the head [REDACTED] [REDACTED] party whose support he could have little right to expect, [REDACTED] whose attachment to him could scarcely be sincere. It consisted [REDACTED] [REDACTED] Chancellor Morton, and several other powerful Peers, [REDACTED] of them related to him in blood, and all offended by [REDACTED] disappointment, which they ascribed to his weakness or negligence, of that rule in the affairs of Scotland which they had expected to found [REDACTED] his marriage. He readily accepted them [REDACTED] friends, and in the gratification of making him [REDACTED] instrument in the destruction of Rizzio, they forgot for the time their resentment towards himself. They spared [REDACTED] arguments to mortify his pride, [REDACTED] to increase his anger. They aggravated the extent of the Italian's influence in public affairs, and his own insignificance, which they represented [REDACTED] a necessary consequence of that influence. They asserted that he owed to Rizzio's intrigues and malice the denial to him of the Crown Matrimonial. They rained at length in him that maddening flame which of all others [REDACTED] the [REDACTED] easily kindled in the weakest minds—they persuaded him that Mary was unfaithful to his bed, and that Rizzio [REDACTED] her paramour. Thus excited, Henry proposed, or [REDACTED] least eagerly agreed, [REDACTED] he should be taken [REDACTED] by assassination. A treaty [REDACTED] regularly concluded between the King and the rest, by which they promised him the Crown Matrimonial, and the independent succession to the Throne, should he outlive [REDACTED] Queen, while he engaged to [REDACTED] himself, should it become necessary, the author of [REDACTED] conspiracy, and [REDACTED] protect those who [REDACTED] undertaken to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] it.

[REDACTED] evening of the [REDACTED] [REDACTED] March, 1566, [REDACTED] appointed [REDACTED] [REDACTED] consummation of the bloody enterprise, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] was murder perpetrated with more savage ferocity, nor marked by stronger proofs of national barbarism. It was known that Rizzio was to sup with the Queen, who was now in the sixth month of her pregnancy, and Henry was anxious that he should die in her presence. The Chancellor Morton personally headed the band of soldiers who secured the avenues to the palace, and the King himself led the assassins into Mary's chamber. To complete the horror of the preparations, Lord Ruthven, the King's uncle, who was appointed to strike the first blow, had risen for that purpose from his bed, where he had been long confined by dangerous illness, and followed Henry, led by his men, and covered with armour, except his face, in which a pallid ghastliness was enlivened only by gleams of furious expression. On their entrance, Rizzio started from his seat, and clung to the person of the Queen, behind whose chair, Henry, silent and unresolute, had taken his station, but Ruthven, drawing his dagger, commanded his followers to seize the devoted victim from his sanctuary, and, in dragging him into the adjoining room, he perished, pierced by fifty-six wounds. Murray and his exiled companions, who had been previously apprised of the murderous plan, entered Edinburgh triumphantly on the following day, and Mary was compelled not only to receive them with an affected complacency, but also to admit into her presence Morton and Ruthven, and to promise them a pardon on their own terms.

Incredible as it may seem, such was the address of Mary, and the weakness and perfidy of her consort, that on the succeeding day, the eleventh of March, she persuaded him to quit the capital privately with her, and to disregard all the engagements by which he had lately bound himself to her enemies. They fled to Dunbar, a country deeply devoted to her, which was presently surrounded by a formidable military host, at which they returned towards Edinburgh, Henry, on his way, issued proclamations, in which he disavowed all knowledge of the enormity, and denounced the aggressors against the Queen.

who had already again fled into England, then, still, the [] of certain refuge for foreign public offenders. The treachery, however, though [] against those whom [] detested, [] but to increase the odium in which [] already [] him. Once more in a state [] comparative security, [] stripped him of all authority, estranged [] almost entirely from his society, and abandoned [] with [] to the company of some almost unknown [] whose delinquencies he had been used to share. [] length roused, and the proofs which he [] such as might have been expected from him, fraught [] folly, caprice, [] indecision. He endeavoured [] interest foreign potentates in his behalf, besought them to receive [] into their dominions, and [] neglected by them. He refused to be present at the pompous baptism of his son, and endeavoured to enrage the Queen by other petty insults. In the mean time Mary's heart, if [] may be [] said, declared for a new favourite, James Hepburn, [] of Bothwell, a man whose character had no point of resemblance to that of her husband but [] total want of principle. With him, painful [] it is to be obliged to reject all doubt [] such a subject, it cannot be reasonably denied [] concerted means of depriving Henry [] life.

[] King had for many weeks resided [] Stirling, neglected and almost in solitude, when a rumour suddenly reached him of a design [] imprison him. [] instantly towards Glasgow, where [] father was at the time, and was seized on [] way thither by a distemper, so violent [] to render his case for [] days utterly hopeless. Mary, by whom [] never been visited during [] extremity, on [] amendment, and arrival [] Glasgow, [] thither, with every profession and appearance [] conjugal tenderness; attended him constantly as his nurse; and, as [] able to bear [] journey, persuaded [] to remove to Edinburgh. [] was carried thither in a litter, and lodged, not in [] palace, but under the pretences [] obtaining better air and more quiet, in a house, then in the suburbs, belonging to the provost of a collegiate church, called Kirk of Field. There Mary's assiduities were increased. He seldom left him during the day, and sometimes slept in the chamber under that which he lay. His fears and suspicions, and peevish humours, were lulled to rest, and the endearments of married days seemed to be revived, when, on Sunday the 9th of February, 1567, N.S., the Queen left him about eleven o'clock at night, to be present at a masque in the palace, and at two o'clock in the morning the house in which he lay was blown up with gunpowder. The bodies of the King, and of the servant who slept in his chamber, were found at a little distance, perfect, and without any marks of fire, or of violence.

HENRY STUART (LORD DARNLEY).

JAMES STUART.

EARL OF MURRAY,

For ■ invariably do we ■ him denominated by that style in all historical authorities, ■ well printed as manuscript, that it might create confusion were ■ to adopt here ■ modern affectation of strict correctness, and call him Earl of Moray, according to the usage of his noble successors of later years, founded ■ the latinized title, "Comes Moravice," in the document by which ■ conferred.

He ■ of the several illegitimate children of King James the Fifth of Scotland, and his mother ■ Margaret, daughter of John Erskine, ■ Earl of Mar, and afterwards wife of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven. He was born in the ■ 1533, and intended, ■ the usual royal fashion of Scotland in providing for such issue, for the ecclesiastical profession. The rich priory of St. Andrews, ■ several other benefices, ■ accordingly conferred ■ him while in his cradle, and he ■ afterwards appointed Prior of Macon, in France. In ■ he accompanied the infant Mary, who was nine ■ younger ■ himself, ■ the court of Paris, where ■ presently imbibed all the refinements which distinguished it; became enamoured of political and military science; ■ so assiduously ■ generally the fine ■ which nature ■ bestowed ■ him, ■ became versed in a variety of knowledge far beyond the scope of the best education of ■ time. To all these qualifications, acquired too in a court never remarkable for the purity of its manners, he is said to have joined a [redacted] towards religion, [redacted] a strict decency of moral conduct, always rare in persons of his age and rank.

He remained several years in France, for it [redacted] seem [redacted] circumstances [redacted] he returned not till 1556, a period rendered peculiarly interesting by the discord of parties, [redacted] religious, and by [redacted] jealousy [redacted] the French interest in Scotland, which was cherished and represented by [redacted] Queen Dowager, Mary [redacted] Guise, who wielded the regency. [redacted] stood aloof for a long time, seemingly to consider and digest in his mind the posture of affairs before he engaged in them. He was however at length nominated by the Parliament one of the eight commissioners deputed to negotiate the treaty of marriage between Mary and the Dauphin, and [redacted] represent the Scottish nation at the celebration of the nuptials, which occurred on the fourteenth of April, 1558. In the [redacted] time he [redacted] to, or [redacted] least left [redacted] opposed, the [redacted] of the Queen Regent, with [redacted] gradually increasing [redacted] however to the [redacted] of the reformers, who had now become a formidable party in the state, and who had been driven into insurrection by some late instances of persecution. The Regent levied an army to chastise them, but was prevailed on to negotiate, and appointed the Lord James, as he was then called, together with the Earl of Argyll, her commissioners for [redacted] [redacted]. A treaty [redacted] concluded, every article of which was broken by her as [redacted] [redacted] the insurgents [redacted] disbanded, and Murray resented her abandonment of [redacted] by promptly and openly joining "the Lords of the Congregation," a denomination by which [redacted] [redacted] of [redacted] Protestants [redacted] thought fit [redacted] distinguish themselves. [redacted] talents, his virtues, and his courage, presently placed him [redacted] their head, and rendered him the idol of the whole party. [redacted] Regent became alarmed [redacted] the formidable attitude [redacted] which he [redacted] [redacted] suddenly placed, and, having vainly endeavoured by splendid offers [redacted] detach [redacted] from his associates, strove, with [redacted] better [redacted] [redacted] insinuate to them [redacted] [redacted] secretly entertained a design to usurp the throne. He now again took up arms, and he appeared among them with a distinct military command, and was elected Regent, in the year of 1560, saved Scotland from the horrors of a civil war. A few days before it occurred he solicited an interview with him; confessed to him the errors of her government, and took leave of him in mutual reconciliation.

His sister, Mary, the regnant Queen of Scotland, Queen Consort in France, became a widow towards the close of the same year, and a Convention of Estates appointed him to wait on her with their solicitations for her return to her kingdom, from which she had been banished for twelve years. In this visit he laid the ground of a system, if not of favour, at least of forbearance with respect to the reformers, and after her arrival, obtained through his influence over them, though with some difficulty, an engagement for her unmolested worship of God in her family according to the ancient faith. He now held, as might have been expected, the first place in her favour, and presently became the object of envy. The Duke of Chatelherault, first prince of the blood, and with him the whole House of Hamilton, and the Earl of Huntly, one of the most powerful among the leaders of the Catholic party, became, from different motives, his enemies. The intemperance of the latter plunged him into open rebellion, and he was defeated in the field, on the sight of Murray, who opposed himself to him, at the head of a small body of troops, his skill and bravery in the command of which gave an ample proof to his country of the extent of his military talents.

Murray might be said to govern the kingdom with perfect cordiality subsisted between the Queen and himself, and their agreement was beheld by all, except the parties just mentioned, without fear or jealousy. She submitted herself wholly to his advice, and the peace of Scotland, for nearly three years, was without interruption but from occasional turbulence of the reformers, when the appearance of Darnley in the character of a suitor for Mary's [redacted] suddenly clouded [redacted] prospect in [redacted] its parts. [redacted] was with Murray's consent that the [redacted] of Lennox and [redacted] [redacted] had been invited into Scotland, nor does it appear that he had in the beginning expressed any disapprobation of Mary's extravagant partiality towards Darnley, but he discovered soon [redacted] their arrival that they [redacted] secretly connected themselves with his enemies, and even that Darnley, in the folly of youth, had complained without reserve of the great extent of the Queen's favour towards him. [redacted] observed [redacted] [redacted] her regard for himself was declining, [redacted] an [redacted] conduct towards him in the sycophants of the court convinced him that he was not mistaken. Too haughty to make remonstrances of doubtful success, and too generous to avail himself of the means of vengeance with which his popularity [redacted] [redacted] him, he retired silently from the court. Mary, [redacted] all the winning persuasion which she eminently possessed, [redacted] him, and he obeyed [redacted] [redacted]. She spared [redacted] [redacted] to pacify and to conciliate him, but she concluded by requesting him to sign a written approbation of her marriage [redacted] Darnley, which he steadfastly refused. From [redacted] hour [redacted] enmity, the [redacted] deadly for having succeeded to a friendship which [redacted] borne all [redacted] marks of sincerity, took place between them. Mary, if she did not encourage, took no pains to check, the fury of Darnley, which extended even to a methodized plan of assassination, while Murray concerted measures with a party, in which were some of his own bitter enemies, for seizing the person of that favoured youth, and conveying [redacted] a prisoner into England, which Mary prevented by a timely flight with him to a place of undoubted security.

Our Elizabeth, bred in a gloomy jealousy of Scotland, to which was added a positive hatred to the person of Mary, though perhaps [redacted] minutely apprized [redacted] [redacted] detail of this design, [redacted] spared [redacted] pains in fomenting [redacted] spirit in which it was conceived. Murray, [redacted] by [redacted] resentment, [redacted] condescended to listen to her overtures, and to engage unwarily in her measures against her country; while Mary, by his determination by commencing against him a positive persecution. Three days only after her marriage with Darnley, she issued a peremptory command, which she knew he durst not obey, for his immediate appearance at her court, and she his declared him an outlaw. At the same time she received into her favour, and even strict confidence, three powerful nobles, who were distinguished as her most implacable enemies, and levied troops with great expedition, to force him and his adherents from those strongholds in the Highlands where they had taken refuge, surrounded by their vassals, and anxiously waiting for aid from their patroness, Elizabeth. That princess, it is true, now publicly interfered for them, especially for Murray, but in a mode purposely contrived to widen the breach. She remonstrated with Mary on the injustice of her conduct towards him, and justified the acts on his part by which it had been provoked. Encouraged by the countenance of so powerful an intercessor, and by the acquisition of a small sum which she had caused to be remitted to them, Murray and his adherents appeared in person. Mary in person marched at the head of her troops to meet them, and drove them before her from Dumfries to the borders, from whence Murray, and a very few of his principal companions, precipitately fled into England, to claim the protection which Elizabeth had given them so many times to expect at her hands. They long remained totally neglected by her, and at length Murray and another obtained with much difficulty an audience, on condition that they should deny, in the presence of the French and Spanish ambassadors, that Elizabeth had encouraged them to take up arms. They soon made this declaration, than she addressed to them the bitter reproaches; charged them with rebellion against their lawful Prince; and in a furious tone commanded them as traitors to quit her presence. She permitted them however to remain in England, to the northernmost part of which they immediately repaired.

While ■■■ incredible piece of treachery was acting in London, Mary called a meeting of Parliament to proceed vigorously against the fugitives. Strong remonstrances, however, in favour of Murray, particularly from those who had been the leaders of the "congregation," induced her to pause. ■■■ also again thought fit to ■■■ her instances, ■■■ Murray himself is improbably said to have been so far induced to forget his own dignity as to solicit and obtain the good offices of David Rizzio. At this precise period, however, Mary secretly joined the fearful conspiracy of France and Spain for ■■■ extermination ■■■ the Protestants in ■■■ their dominions, and Murray was ■■■ illustrious ■ victim ■ be spared. She again determined therefore to prosecute him with the utmost expedition and severity, when the strange event ■■■ the assassination of Rizzio, and its consequences, once ■■■ averted the execution of her vengeance, but excited considerations which suddenly rendered her immediate reconciliation with Murray prudent, ■ not necessary. The conspirators, Morton, Ruthven, and the rest, his old ■■■ ■■■ partisans, ■■■ regularly apprised him, in ■■■ neighbouring exile, of ■■■ progress ■■■ their frightful enterprise, and of its ■■■ ■■■ he arrived in Edinburgh on the evening following the murder, to join them in the desperate project which they ■■■ formed ■■■ extorting ■ pardon from the Queen. The great advantage which ■■■ might derive from ■■■ division of this powerful party instantly occurred to her, and she lost no time in attempting it. ■■■ received Murray, with those who ■■■ fled, and now returned, with him, in the most gracious manner, promised them ■ utter oblivion of their offences, and ■■■ ■ renewal of her favour, and Murray, with his friends, consented to abandon the assassins of Rizzio, who fled with precipitation into the foreign asylum which ■■■ others ■■■ so lately quitted. These matters occurred in the month of March, 1565-6.

A year succeeded, crowned with most extraordinary events, the relation of which belongs to the general history of Scotland, in which the name of Murray scarcely once ■■■ during this period. Among a number of conditions which late reconciliation with Mary had been founded, was a solemn pledge given on his part to abstain from all acts of enmity against the Earl of Bothwell, between whom and himself a bitter discord had long subsisted, and this may in some measure account for his inaction in any of the scenes which had their origin in the iniquitous ambition of the nobleman, the scarcely less criminal weakness of the Queen. It has been said, but improbably, that he recommended her to marry Bothwell. About the middle of the year he obtained permission to travel, and set up his residence in France, where he remained while a mighty combination of nobles was forming for the deposition of Mary, and carrying its views into effect. That they were advised and animated by him from his retreat there can be little doubt, though history affords a clear proof of that fact. The infant James was now placed on the throne; Murray returned; and, with an affected reluctance, accepted the office of Regent on the twenty-third of August, 1567.

His very entrance on high office evinced a clearness of judgment, a consistency of action, and, if the expression may be allowed, a political morality, of neither of which the Scots of that day had any examples in their former governors. Before, however, his administration could assume a settled character, many distractions arose. Mary escaped from her confinement at Lochleven, raised an army. Darnley and Irresolution seized his adherents. They pressed him to negotiate or to retreat, but he remained unmoved, and, having disposed of his inferior force to the best advantage, waited the storm which he knew he might expect from the Queen's impetuosity. The decisive battle of Langside followed, and he vanquished Mary and sent her into England, never to return. The Regent used his victory with mercy and moderation. Few had perished in the field, and none subsequently by the hands of the executioner. He was returning to his civil duties of his office when a new and unexpected call again withdrew him from them. Mary, who it is known that was a prisoner, in the hands of Elizabeth, resolved to submit her cause to the judgment of that Princess, who readily accepted the jurisdiction, and required the Regent to conduct towards his Sovereign. Commissioners for the discussion were appointed on each side, and the celebrated conferences at York and Westminster ensued, the detail of which is so well known to historical readers that it would be idle were it possible to repeat any part of it in this necessarily superficial sketch. Suffice it therefore to say that the sound sense of Murray was baffled on every point by the deep artifice of Elizabeth and her ministers; that even on the single question to which he had previously resolved to give an explicit answer, namely, whether the Queen of Scots had been a party in the murder of her husband, he was at length drawn in to make a clear and definite declaration.

Little more can be said of this eminent person. The short remainder of his life presents nothing to view beyond the ordinary measures of good domestic government, which adorned the brief term of his administration, and procured for him the appellation of "the good Regent," by which he was long distinguished in Scotland. He perished by the hand of an assassin, of a junior line of that illustrious family with which he had been always at bitter variance; not in pursuance of that feud, nor for any public cause, but to avenge an injury purely private and personal. In riding through the high street of the town of Linlithgow, on the twenty-third of January, 1570, he was shot through the body by James Hamilton, of Bothwellhaugh, and died within a few hours after.

The Earl of Murray married, in February, 1561, Anne, daughter of William Keith, fourth Earl Marischal, and afterwards wife of Colin Campbell, sixth Earl of Argyll. He was by her two daughters; Elizabeth, married to James Stewart, son of the Lord Down; and Margaret, to Francis Hay, ninth Earl of Errol.

JOHN KNOX.

THE life of ■ ecclesiastical reformer, a title always bestowed on those whose endeavours to overthrow ■ religious establishment have been crowned by success, requires many episodes to render it interesting to any others than those of ■ own profession. The journeyings, and preachings, ■ mortifications, and weepings, and raptures of such a person ; nay, his very prophecies, unless ■ one of them should chance to be verified, which, for the best of ■ reasons, scarcely ■ happens ; ■ never attract general attention. To bespeak ■ regard he ■ have rained armies by the magic of his eloquence, hurled Kings from their thrones, annihilated civil systems, burned multitudes of persons, or must at least himself have been burned. Knox had none of these recommendations. He was ■ busy instrument in the propagation of ■ schism which would have worked its way, perhaps not quite ■ speedily, ■ he had ■ had existence. He ■ deputed to undermine by coarse and vulgar declamation ■ monarchy, the honour of pulling down which his employers intended to ■ to themselves. His brutal insolence to the Sovereigns under whom ■ lived never exalted itself to active rebellion ; ■ suffered ■ punishment which could be deemed persecution, ■ ■ station afford him ■ power of persecuting others. His secret transactions and engagements with the ■ persons whom he joined ■ disturbing ■ peace of ■ country have ■ been diacovered, and his history is wholly confined to the springs of fanaticism and sedition.

Who were his parents is unknown, yet the fact of his having been descended from an ancient and respectable family of Knox of Renfearleigh, in the shire of Renfrew, is supported by such strong presumptions that it cannot be doubted. He was born in 1505, at a village called Giffard, in the Lothian, and having received his education in the clerical profession at the grammar-school of the neighbouring town of Haddington, was removed to the University of Andrews, where he studied under the tuition of John Mair, an eminent teacher of the theology then in vogue, with such application and activity that he is said to have obtained the degree of Master of Arts while yet a youth, and to have been admitted into priest's orders before the age prescribed by ecclesiastical law. The subtleties, however, of school divinity were ill suited to his simple and inquisitive character of his mind, and he soon abandoned them for the study of the primitive fathers, in which he passed several years of diligent application. At length the doctrines of the Reformation reached Scotland, he attached himself to a priest of the name of Williams, provincial of the Scottish Benedictines, who had not only translated the New Testament, but had publicly decried the Pope's authority, and soon after, in 1544, renounced in form the Roman Catholic faith, and became the regular disciple of the famous George Wishart. He attended that moderate pastor as his spiritual guide till the commencement of the year 1546, when Wishart was put to death, and celebrated his memory in the usual strain which such writers apply to such subjects.

From his connection with Wishart he derived considerable fame among the reformers, who began to consider and regard him as the head of their new church. The Lords of Ormeston and Langniddry, powerful men, who were then chief temporal patrons of the new persuasion, appointed him to their children, and lived in their houses.

Processes were lengthened against him, and he refused to fly to Germany, but those gentlemen persuaded him to take refuge in St. Andrews, where his castle was then besieged by the persons who had lately assassinated in it Cardinal Beaton, its governor. Knox, who had witnessed that murder "a godly thing," which he repeats in his history, was received by them with joy. He expounded and catechised so hopefully that they declared "the gift of God to be in him," and called on him with one voice to assume the office of a public preacher, which, after long persuasion, he accepted, and presently after signalled himself by a sermon so furious that the new Primate instantly took measures to silence him. These, however, were prevented by the party in the castle, which in fact ruled the town; and the Catholics could do little beyond summoning Knox to a public disputation, to which he gladly agreed, in which, as might be expected, he was told that he was completely successful. The whole city now embraced his doctrines; the church relinquished its opposition which in that place was utterly fruitless; and he remained there, with the merit at least of indefatigable application to his object, till July, 1547, when the castle was reduced by a French force, and he was put on board the French galleys which brought it over, in which he remained on board of France a prisoner for two years.

In 1549 he was liberated, and returned to London, where he obtained a licence to preach at Berwick, and soon after at Newcastle on Tyne, and repaired for that purpose into the north. During his residence there he received the appointment of a chaplain in ordinary to Edward the Sixth, as well as rebukes for the extravagancy of certain of his tenets, and returned to London in the spring of 1553, where he refused to accept a living which the Privy Council had moved Archbishop Cranmer to bestow on him, and vilified the King's government in his sermons, under the name of Achitophel, Judas, &c. To have prosecuted him specifically for his insolence, might have been then very injurious to the crown.

of the Reformation, they endeavoured therefore to curb him by another method. ■■■■ before the Council to ■■■■ reasons for refusing the benefice, with the view, probably, of provoking him ■■■■ invectives against the ■■■■ establishment in England. ■■■■ answers, though sufficiently ■■■■ dissatisfaction with that system, were uttered with such caution that no ■■■■ ground could be taken whereon ■■■■ institute any further proceeding against him, but he ■■■■ dismissed with an admonition which, however gently delivered, determined him to ■■■■ his vocation in ■■■■ country, and he was preaching ■■■■ the towns and villages of Buckinghamshire, ■■■■ large congregations, probably attracted by ■■■■ novelty of ■■■■ dialect which must have been unintelligible to them, when the accession of Mary rendered it prudent for him to quit the kingdom. He embarked for Dieppe ■■■■ February, 1554, N S, and travelled from thence to Geneva, where he placed himself in the presence, and under the orders of his great spiritual principal, John Calvin.

Calvin presently deputed him to Frankfort, to minister to the English Protestants who ■■■■ from the violence of Mary, and settled in great numbers in that city, but his doctrines ■■■■ more offensive to these good people than those of the Church of Rome. Unwilling to ■■■■ in endless controversy with him, and unable to prevail on him to ■■■■ the English Liturgy they took ■■■■ short method to disencumber themselves of him, accusing him of treason ■■■■ the magistrates of the city, both against their sovereign the Emperor, and against Queen Mary, upon which the magistrates, ■■■■ that they could ■■■■ avoid surrendering him to either of these Potentates who might demand his person, secretly apprised him of ■■■■ danger, and he returned precipitately to Geneva, where he remained from March, 1555, till ■■■■ following August, when ■■■■ determined to visit ■■■■ his native land. His transactions there, during the abode of a year, present little beyond ■■■■ usual contents of the journal ■■■■ any other itinerant preacher. It ■■■■ true ■■■■ Scottish from Popery had assumed, during his long absence, the character of an important political implement, and the consequence necessarily increased. The nobility of the Kirk, as it began to be called, the regular opponents of the Court government of the Queen Regent; Knox was too promising an agent to be neglected: and they courted his intimacy. They easily prevailed on him to affront that lady by addressing to her a letter, abusing the faith in which she lived, and exhorting her to hear his sermons; and Mary, with great justice, called it a pasquinade. The Prelates at length cited him in answer for his conduct, and he obeyed by repairing to Edinburgh on the appointed day, and preaching there the largest congregation that he had ever drawn together. No further steps however were taken against him while he remained in Scotland; yet in July, 1556, he more returned to Geneva, and had no sooner disappeared than the Bishops again cited him, and, on his non-appearance, condemned him to death for heresy, and his effigy was burned in Edinburgh. In all this there was much of the air of a compromise.

In the summer of the following year the discontented Lords, conceiving that they had now gained sufficient strength to protect him against the government, pressed him to return to Scotland, and Calvin told him that to refuse would be "rebellion against God, and cruelty to his country;" as he set out on his journey, but when he had reached Dieppe, and was about to embark, he received letters, informing him that some leading persons in the party had begun to waver, and recommending it to him to stay for a time on the Continent. Knox appears to have been excited to great wrath by these intimations. He was prudent enough to take the advice of his friends, and returned to Geneva, doubtful of their sincerity, of their power, or both; but he answered the letters with denunciations of vengeance, uttered in a style of papal authority, against inconstancy in any of his disciples. He was sufficiently employed however in the good work at Geneva, wrote, and printed there, his invective against sovereignty of females, the awful title of "The Trumpet against the monstrous Regimen of Women," and remarkable of his works, aimed once against own Queen, and our Mary. He was preparing a second Blast, when the last named Princess died, and accession of Elizabeth, whose aversion to popery well known, induced lay it aside. In contemplation of obtaining her furtherance now determined to visit England, and wrote to Cecil for a licence to that end, which was peremptorily and scornfully refused. Knox discovered induced repulse, forced the Secretary correspondence its merits, in which, however disgusting the insolence, and obstinacy, and mad fanaticism of the man, cannot but admire his sincerity and courage.

To give short extract from this most singular letter :—
 "If think me," says he, "either enemy to the person, or yet the regimen, of her whom God hath now promoted,
 they utterly deceived of me ; for the miraculous work
 God, comforting his afflicted by an infirm vessel, I do acknowledge ; and the power of his most potent hand (raising whom best pleaseth his mercy to suppress such as fight against his glory) I will obey, albeit that nature, and God's perfect ordinance, repugn to such regimen. plainly to speak, Queen Elizabeth shall confess the extraordinary dispensation of God's great mercy maketh lawful unto which both nature and God's law doth deny women, then shall in England be more willing maintain her lawful authority than I be ; but if,
 God's wondrous work set aside, she ground, as God forbid, justness her title upon consuetude, laws, ordinances of men, then I am assured as such foolish presumption highly offend God's supreme Majesty, I greatly her ingratitude long punishment."
 writing thus to Cecil, addressed a herself, in which we find following menacing

—“If in God’s presence you yourself, as in my heart I glorify God for that rest granted to his ~~country~~ England under you, a weak instrument, so will I with tongue and pen justify your authority and regimen, as the Holy Ghost hath justified the same in Deborah, ~~the~~ blessed mother in Israel : But, if the premisses, as God forbid, neglected, you shall begin to brag of your birth, ~~and~~ build your authority ~~and~~ regimen upon your own law, flatter you who so list, your felicity ~~and~~ short.” Need it be asked whether this was the effect of inspiration or insanity ?

Too much however in ~~the~~ to ~~himself~~ ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~hands~~, ~~and~~ hopeless ~~and~~ converting her ~~to~~ puritanism, he ~~and~~ set out for Scotland, and arrived there in May, 1559. He ~~and~~ ~~and~~ after nominated by the Lords of the Congregation, ~~and~~ they had for some time styled themselves, together with another preacher, to endeavour to obtain by negotiation that Princess’s aid to the temporal views of the Kirk, which, as is well known, she most readily granted. The subversion of the ancient religion was now consummated. Knox ~~and~~ posed ~~a~~ code of constitutions for ~~the~~ newly-invented church, ~~in~~ great length, and digested with a clearness and precision ~~and~~ which, in spite of ~~the~~ ferocious wildness, he ~~and~~ very capable. One of the nine general heads which ~~he~~ comprised was intitled, “Touching the Suppression of Idolatry,” and ~~and~~ ~~and~~ this sweeping clause—“Idolatry, with all ~~and~~ and places of the name, as abbeyes, chapels, monkeries, friaries, nunneries, chantries, cathedrai churches, canonries, colleges, other ~~and~~ presently ~~and~~ parish churches ~~and~~ schools, to be utterly suppressed in all places of this realm ; palaces, mansions, ~~and~~ dwelling-houses, with their orchards and ~~and~~ dens, only excepted.” ~~the~~ Estates, ~~and~~ before they ~~and~~ ~~and~~ ~~and~~ constitutions, became so enamoured ~~and~~ ~~and~~ peculiar article, that they passed an act specially for the execution ~~and~~ ~~and~~ provisions, ~~and~~ Knox aided their pious intention by simultaneously proclaiming ~~and~~ a sermon ~~and~~ ~~and~~ “sure could [REDACTED] under her. "She promised him [REDACTED] to her," says the most popular of [REDACTED] historians, quoting, in this instance, Knox's own authority, "whenever he demanded it: and she [REDACTED] desired him, if he found her blameable [REDACTED] anything, to reprehend her freely in private, rather than vilify her in [REDACTED] pulpit before [REDACTED] the people; but he plainly [REDACTED] her [REDACTED] [REDACTED] had a public ministry entrusted to him; that [REDACTED] she would [REDACTED] to church she should hear the gospel of truth; and that it was not his business to apply [REDACTED] every individual, nor [REDACTED] he leisure for such occupation." "This rustic apostle," [REDACTED] the same writer, "scruples not in [REDACTED] history [REDACTED] inform [REDACTED] that he once treated her with such [REDACTED] rity that she lost [REDACTED] command of her temper, and dissolved into tears before him. Yet, so far from being moved with youth and beauty and royal dignity, reduced to that condition, he persevered in his insolent reproofs, and when he relates this incident, he even discovers a visible pride [REDACTED] satisfaction in his own conduct." Innumerable instances [REDACTED] this [REDACTED] insolence towards the fair Queen might be cited from Knox's [REDACTED] relation.

This singular person survived the date of the complete establishment of [REDACTED] church for ten years, a portion of his [REDACTED] which affords not a single circumstance worthy to be recorded. With [REDACTED] show of [REDACTED] indeed have his disciples asserted [REDACTED] Providence raised him up especially to perform that work, for certainly he was qualified for [REDACTED] other, and sunk, therefore, after he [REDACTED] accomplished it, into [REDACTED] parative insignificance. He died, after a gradual decay of three months, on [REDACTED] twenty-fourth of November, 1572, and was buried in [REDACTED] churchyard of the parish of [REDACTED] Giles's, Edinburgh. Knox, amidst [REDACTED] pious cares, seems to have been by no means inattentive to his private interests: there is [REDACTED] to believe that he died even wealthy. Certain it is [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] twice very respectably married; first, to Margaret Bowes, of the ancient family of that [REDACTED] in the county of Durham; secondly, [REDACTED] Margaret, daughter of Andrew [REDACTED]

Stuart, [REDACTED] Ochiltree. By his [REDACTED] wife [REDACTED] [REDACTED] sons, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] Eleazar, who were educated [REDACTED] St. John's College, in [REDACTED] University of Cambridge, became Fellows of that house, and beneficed clergymen in England; and one daughter, married to Robert Pont, a Lord [REDACTED] Session. By the second, he had three daughters, two of whom became the wives of ministers of the names of Welch and Fleming.

Knox's writings—all, as might be expected, of the polemical class—were numerous. His "History of the Reformation within the realm of Scotland," a book on many accounts of considerable curiosity, is well known; for [REDACTED] rest, it [REDACTED] painful to enumerate works which no one in this time has read, or will read, and yet some mention of them may be expected here. The following [REDACTED] extant [REDACTED] print:—"A faithful Admonition to the true Professors of the Gospel of [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the Kingdom of England," 1554—"A [REDACTED] Letter [REDACTED] Mary, Queen Regent [REDACTED] Scotland," 1556—"The Appellation of John Knox from the cruel and unjust Sentence pronounced against him by the false Bishops and Clergy [REDACTED] Scotland, with a Supplication and Exhortation to the Nobility, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] and Commonalty of [REDACTED] same Realm," 1558—"The First Blast," &c. already spoken of, 1558—"A [REDACTED] Exhortation to England for the speedy Embracing of Christ's Gospel, heretofore by the Tyranny of Mary suppressed and banished," 1559—"An Answer to a great number of blasphemous Cavillations written by [REDACTED] Anabaptist, and Adversary of God's eternal Predestination," 1560—"A Reply to the Abbot of Crossragwell's (Crossregal) 'Faith, or Catechism,' with [REDACTED] Conference with that Abbot," 1562—"A Sermon preached before the King" (Henry Darnley), 1563—"An Answer [REDACTED] [REDACTED] written by James Tyrie, a Jesuit," [REDACTED] [REDACTED] Other [REDACTED] his pieces are printed in Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, [REDACTED] several of his manuscripts existed about eighty years since in the hands of a Mr. [REDACTED] Woodrow, a [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the [REDACTED]

THOMAS HOWARD,

DUKE OF NORFOLK

(1571)

THOMAS HOWARD,

FOURTH DUKE OF NORFOLK.

HENRY, Earl of Surrey, the poet, the soldier, and the victim to the cruelty and injustice of Henry the Eighth, and Frances, third daughter of John de Vere, fifteenth Earl of Oxford, were the parents of this great nobleman. The sanguinary policy of his father made way for his succession to the Dukedom in 1567, on the demise of his grandfather, Thomas, the third Duke, whose family had been restored to blood in the first year of Queen Mary. The precise date of his birth is unknown, but he was at that time twenty-one years old. He received his early education in the Protestant faith, in the family of his aunt, the Duchess of Norfolk, who was a zealous reformer; and probably afterwards resided at the University of Oxford, since we find that he took there the degree of Master of Arts on the nineteenth of April, 1568.

He had espoused Elizabeth's title to the Crown with the ardour of youth, and with the sincerity and inexperience, and was one of the earliest objects of her gratitude when she succeeded to it. She invested him with the Order of the Garter, and in the following year appointed him her Lieutenant in the North, and Commander-in-chief of her forces there. In his military characters, he concluded a treaty, and soon afterwards arrived at Berwick, with the Lords, who, for the protection of the Duke of Chateaubault, next heir to the Crown, ■■■ opposed to ■■■ ■■■■ interest in Scotland ; but the peace ■ Edinburgh, which speedily followed, prevented him from any opportunity of signalizing himself ■ ■■■ field. ■ 1567, ■■■■ ■■■ Ninth of France having complimented Elizabeth ■■■■ authority to invest two of her subjects with his then much-valued order of St. Michael, ■■■■ Norfolk to share ■■■■ distinction. In ■■■ next year he was one of the three Commissioners appointed to examine ■ York ■■ charges brought by the Regent Murray against the captive Queen of Scots, and here he first seriously entertained the idea of that unfortunate matrimonial scheme which ■■■ length proved ■ fatal to him.

■ first overture of this project had been made to him two years before by Maitland of Lethington, Mary's Secretary of State, shortly before her marriage to Darnley, when the Duke ■ waived it," ■■ we are told, "with ■ modest refusal." Murray, with motives very different, now secretly reiterated the proposal, but it ■■■ perhaps yet more discouraged than before by Norfolk, who objected, with ■■■■ degree of disdain, to an offer of marriage with ■■■■ who laboured under a suspicion, indeed a formal accusation, of dreadful crimes, although that woman were ■ Sovereign. The correspondence however with Murray, though the subject perhaps ■■■ at present unknown, ■■■ not escape the vigilance of Elizabeth's spies, who discovered also that the Duke sometimes communicated with Lethington, and others in confidence with the Queen of Scots. In the exercise too ■ his office of Commissioner, signs of partiality to her ■■■■ were occasionally observed. Elizabeth's jealousy was awakened, and ■■■■ exclaimed, in the hearing of several ■ her Court, that "the Queen of Scots would ■■■■ want a ■■■■ ■ long as Norfolk lived."

Early in the succeeding year, 1569, ■■■ find the ■■■■ wavering ■ the proposal of the match. He had consulted some of his friends ; had been encouraged by them to adopt the project ; and ■ small party was secretly in ■■■■ ■■■■ sure to forward its views. To the scheme for the marriage was another, for that only daughter to the young King of Scotland, Mary's son. Elizabeth, who became imperfectly apprised these transactions, now just ground anger, though she had to suspect loyalty. Even in the midst of their ingenuously laid before her certain splendid offers by which the King of Spain had sought to corrupt his fidelity, and to induce him to employ his great power and popularity in embarrassing her government. more failure of that profound deference to royalty which in those days rendered it necessary for a nobleman to obtain to his marriage the previous approbation of his Prince, not mention the peculiar circumstances of the bride proposed in this case, could not but have given high offence to a Sovereign less irritable and tenacious than Elizabeth. She dissembled, however, her till she could fathom the whole of the plan to utmost, and the that she used for that purpose, though not absolutely proved, are indicated by such powerful historical probabilities to dispel all reasonable doubt. The Earl of Leicester, who unworthily possessed the Duke's confidence, employed by her to abuse it. The darkness which involved the motives of that subtle and unprincipled man, in his day, has in the lapse of time become generally impenetrable; but it is scarcely possible to surmise with degree of plausibility what other end he, who moved but with view of serving interest, chiefly by cultivating favour, could have proposed by his conduct in this affair. The concurrent testimony of all historians of time has assured us that Leicester, at this very period, came suddenly forward to urge the Duke with vehemence to conclude the treaty for the match, and undertook himself an active and busy in its promotion; that when it on the point of being accomplished, he affected sick, and on receiving her, discovered the whole to the Queen; and that he so devoted his friend to almost certain ruin, under the pretence of endeavouring to save himself from possible displeasure.

Howard however entertained no partiality for some of his friends in Norfolk, and wished to save him. She received him with apparent complacency, and soon warned him by hints of his danger. Dining with her at Farnham, she "advised him pleasantly to be careful on what pillow he laid his head." She informed him soon after that all had been imparted to her, and reproached him with severity. He now besought his friends to mediate for him, and retired to his estates in Norfolk, but soon returned to the Court, where on his arrival he learned that the Queen had in the meantime received a letter from Murray, with some disclosures. He was summoned to appear before the Privy Council, and, having made a large confession, the effusion, not of fear, but of a passion not less honourable than lofty, was committed to the Tower on the eleventh of October, 1569, on a charge of high misdemeanors, from whence, after a year's imprisonment, he was removed to a milder restraint in his own house, under the care of Sir Henry Neville. Here he was visited by that able minister, Burghley, who loved him not less than he loved honour and impartiality, and who, says Camden, "did all he could to work him over to marry any other woman, whereby he would afterwards be cleared from suspicion, and the state be out of fear; notwithstanding," continues the same author, "there were some who thought he was now set at liberty on purpose that he might be brought into some greater danger. It is certain that more things came to light afterwards than he was aware of, and the fidelity of those who were his greatest confidants, either by hope or bribery, began to fail him."

Howard's design had indeed sunk too deeply into Norfolk's mind to be eradicated. He was no longer free from all custody than he engaged in a regular correspondence with

Mary, who suggested applications for Pope, and the King of Spain, with other expedients full of danger to the state. This enlargement of the plan was even proposed to seize the person of Elizabeth, and to restore the Catholic religion in England, this the Duke was proved to have rejected with horror and detestation. The of persons of mean rank, and of doubtful character, employed, among them one of the of Higford, Duke's secretary, whom he was obliged to intrust with the deciphering of Mary's letters, and others, the originals of strictly ordered to destroy. This however he disobeyed, and, in the summer of 1571, having been detected in the act of conveying a of money from the French Ambassador to Mary's party in Scotland, and cast into prison, in a mixture of fear and treachery voluntarily directed Elizabeth's government to the secret place in which he had deposited them. Norfolk immediately arrested; the seventh of September again committed to the Tower; and, the sixteenth of the succeeding January, tried by twenty-five Peers, George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, presiding as Lord High Steward, on charge of high treason, obscurely stated in the indictment, and by no proved by the produced against him, which the sole evidence employed on the occasion: on that however he was found guilty, and was condemned in the of the well-known of Edward the Sixth, which enacts that no person shall be convicted of high treason but on the parole testimony of at least two witnesses, to be confronted with the accused.

When the usual final question was put to him—" he had say why judgment of death should not be passed on him?" answered only, "God's will be done, who will judge between me and my false accusers." The then pronounced, which he heard with calmness, when it was ended said to the Lords in a firm but modest tone, "Sentence is passed on me as a traitor. I have none to trust to but God and the Queen : I am excluded from your society, I hope shortly to enjoy the heavenly. I will fit myself die : only this thing I crave—that the Queen would be kind to my children and servants, that my debts be paid." Camden, who officially present the trial, records these speeches, has in his excellent "Annals of Elizabeth," a number of minute particulars connected with this nobleman's story, too extensive to be here inserted otherwise in substance, given with a fidelity impartiality unusual with the historical writers of time ; but he prudently leaves the inferences to be drawn by posterity. There is no doubt that the Duke's ambition aimed the future attainment of the station of King Consort, if the phrase may be allowed, of Scotland, and eventually of England ; and it is a blameless ambition, for it involved no question Elizabeth's right to reign, nor of any disturbance of the regular succession to the throne, but aimed merely at the chance of partaking in the splendour of a legal presumptive inheritance.

Elizabeth hesitated for several months whether to take the life of a nobleman perhaps not less beloved by herself than by her people, but at length gave way to those predominant feminine passions, fear and jealousy. An address, doubtless with her secret concurrence, was at length presented to her by a committee of both Houses of Parliament, beseeching her to sign the warrant for execution, with which, affecting that she could not resist the voice of her people declared, she complied ; and on the second of June, 1572, she suffered death on the scaffold, with pious resignation and dignified calmness, which bespoke once purity and the grandeur of his character.

Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, thrice married ; first to Mary, daughter and one of the coheirs of Henry Fitzalan, fourteenth and last of Arundel of his ancient name, who in childbirth, on the twenty-fifth of August, 1557, under of seventeen, leaving however her infant son, Philip, who became of Arundel in right of his mother. He married secondly, Margaret, daughter and sole heir of Thomas Lord Audley of Walden, and Chancellor, and widow of Henry, a younger son of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, by her two sons, Thomas and William, respectively of the present of and Carlisle; and two daughters, Elizabeth, who is infant; and Margaret, married to Richard Sackville, third Dorset of . The Duke's lady was Elizabeth, daughter of Francis Leyburne, widow of Thomas, fourth Lord of Gillesland.

11

-

WILLIAM POWLETT,

FIRST MARQUESS OF WINCHESTER.

contemplating tyranny, the violence, the injustice of the time in which this eminent person flourished, we pause with peculiar complacency on the circumstances of a life marked by a prosperity so unvaried as scarcely to be paralleled in the annals of human felicity. In four reigns not less distinguished by the occasional sway of despotism or faction than by the alternate predominance, and consequent persecutions, of two conflicting churches, he held uninterruptedly the highest offices in the state, under the protection of a happy medium of royal favour, which appears not at any time either to have increased or abated. This was not good fortune. It seems to have been the simple result of a sincere loyalty; of a sagacity which confined its objects; and of a zeal in the public service wholly uninfluenced by ambition. His life was extended far beyond the usual age of the healthiest men, and he died in the possession of immense wealth, of an honest character. The happiness of this man has been in no small measure entailed on his numerous posterity, for the axe has never yet reeked with the blood of a Powlett, nor have their estates in any instance fallen under the power of attainder.

He was the eldest of three sons of John Powlett, Knight of Bath, heir to the second line of a noble family, originally from Picardy, which in the thirteenth century acquired the Lordship of Powlett, Poulet, or Paulat in Somersetshire, and afterwards used [redacted] surname, by [redacted] zabeth, daughter to [redacted] Poulet, of Hinton [redacted] George, [redacted] same county, who represented the elder, and whose posterity has been also since ennobled. [redacted] was born in the year 1475, [redacted] it [redacted] most singular that [redacted] period to the fifty-eighth year of [redacted] age no genuine memorial is to be found even of [redacted] solitary fact of [redacted] intermediate life. Naunton alone, speaking of him and [redacted] the then Earl [redacted] Pembroke [redacted] generally that "they were both younger brothers," (a mistake, as we have just now seen, with respect to Powlett,) "yet of [redacted] houses, and spent what was left them and came on trust to the Court, where, upon the bare stock of their wits, they began to traffic for themselves, and prospered [redacted] well that they got, spent, and left more than any subjects from the Norman conquest to [redacted] own times." In 1533 then we first meet with him, at that time a knight, in the [redacted] of Comptroller of [redacted] King's household; [redacted] in the following year, [redacted] Lord Herbert informs us, he [redacted] joined in commission with three of Henry's most highly trusted servants to accompany and assist the Duke of Norfolk, who [redacted] then despatched [redacted] Marseilles, by the desire of Francis the First, [redacted] attend an interview of that monarch with Pope Clement the Seventh.

In [redacted] he [redacted] was appointed Treasurer of the Household, and by a patent of [redacted] ninth of March, 1539, was raised to the Peerage by [redacted] title of Baron St. John of Beasing, in Hants, an estate which he derived from the marriage of an ancestor with a co-heir of the House of Poynings, in which that Barony had been formerly vested. On this domain he erected a magnificent seat, and here Naunton, in asserting that [redacted] "had spent what was [redacted] him," is again in [redacted] On the establishment of the Court of Wards and Liveries in 1540, [redacted] placed in the important office of Master, and in [redacted] succeeding year received the Order of the Garter. We [redacted] [redacted] in the number of executors of Henry's will, [redacted] of the Council of guardians appointed by it for the

with the rapidity almost peculiar in his favourites, a class to which he certainly never belonged. On the nineteenth of January, 1549, he was created Earl of Wiltshire; he was presently after appointed Lord High Treasurer; and on the twelfth of October, 1551, elevated to the dignity of Marquis of Winchester. In the same year he presided as Lord High Steward at the trial of the Protector Duke of Somerset, to whose enormous influence he had probably owed his lately-acquired distinctions.

In the brief struggle for the succession to the throne after Edward's death, he espoused Mary's title with courage and frankness. With this disposition, together perhaps with an acquiescence which has been hinted that he too readily and suddenly professed in the religious faith of that Princess, it is not strange that he should have continued to possess her favour, and his high office, during her reign. The insinuation, however, of this courtly sacrifice of conscience is solely a few careless words of Robert Naunton, whom we have already twice convicted of misrepresenting this great man. Naunton merely says, again coupling Pembroke with the Marquis, "that they two were always of the King's religion, and over-zealous professors." Certainly neither a partiality for Mary, nor to her religion, was likely to recommend him to Elizabeth, yet she left him undisturbed in the possession of his post of Lord Treasurer till his death; and from this, and indeed from all considerations which the very scanty particulars that we have of him may authorize us to form, we may draw an inference more satisfactory than we frequently obtain from direct historical report, that he was an able, a faithful, and altogether worthy public servant, whose memory derives a higher credit from the silence of detraction than it might have acquired from that probably qualified and doubtful eulogy which history has denied to his character.

It is true that his long continuance in office has been ascribed to a readiness of compliance with the variety of factions which distinguished his time; and we charge has arisen from an ill-natured paraphrase of Naunton's of a favourite saying of the ancient minister which has been eagerly transcribed into peerages, and other books of as little biographical weight—"Being questioned," said Naunton, "by an [redacted] friend of his how he [redacted] up for thirty years together amidst the changes and reigns of so many chancellors and great persons," "Why," quoth [redacted] quia, 'ortus sum ex sabce, non [redacted] quercu,' I [redacted] made of the pliable willow, not of the stubborn oak." Naunton had derived [redacted] information which he [redacted] gabled [redacted] [redacted] contemporary of his own, Sir Julius Caesar [redacted] an abstract made by Dr Burch, remaining in the Museum, of an original journal kept by that statesman during almost the whole of his long life, we find the following entry —

"Late supping I forbear,
Wine and women I forswear,
My neck and feet I keep from cold,
No marvel then though I be old
I am a willow, not an oak,
I chide, but never hurt with stroke"

"This," continues Sir Julius, "was the [redacted] of my godfather, William Poulet, Knt., Lord St John, Earl of Wiltshire, Marquis of Winchester, Lord High Treasurer of England, being demanded by an inward friend how [redacted] had lived in the times of seven monarchs, in all times of his life increasing in greatness of honour and preferment." Thus the Marquis [redacted] in the first four lines the [redacted] by which he [redacted] attained to a very old age, and in the two last, how he [redacted] maintained himself in his public stations in times of great difficulty—"I corrected mildly, says he, with a willow twig, and not with an oaken cudgel." [redacted] answer therefore refers, not to the practice of submission, but to the exercise of authority.

A few original letters, all on [redacted] same subject, and that [redacted] connected with history, [redacted] less with biography, from nobleman to an office of the Royal Household, are preserved in the Museum. I will however close these meagre notices with a transcript of one of them, only because I believe that we have at present no published example of his pen, but for the somewhat curious intelligence which it affords of the difficulties to which the Court, and even the Monarch, were then exposed during the visitations of pestilence.

"I commend me hartely to you, and thus the Quene's Ma^{ty} don verry well to proge the Flyament to Octobr monethes, & to adorne the Term to Hillary next. The Exchequer, the receit, wilbe well kept in Syon, and for the triall of that I have sent; and at Shene the Courts of the Wards and of the Duchy may be well kept, yf Mr. Sakvile can be so plesed (wherof I dont, because he hath no oder lodging ny t'hand out of London) to whom I have writen, and shall have aunse from him wth spede, and upon his aunse I shall returne you pfit knolege in that matt^r I think howse of the Quene's about London wthin xii myllen meet for her Grace's access to before the feast of All Saints: then I commend you howses after wrighten, to serve if need requier—Hatfeld; Grafton; the Moore; Woodstok; Langley, no good wynter howse and yet my Ladye's of Warwycke for tearme of lyfe. Homewards from Langley I bring the Quene but by Rading, and by Newberie, where they die, wherin may be great perell, more than I wishe be. I commend her Ma^{ty} were where her Highnes now is, Wyndsore, where there conteneuwe, though the howse be cowlde, wth may be holpen wth good fyres; and if her Highnes shalbe forced to remove, as God forbid, I think best the Howsehold be put to bowrde some certyne of Councsell appoynted to wayte, herselfe to repayre to Otland, where her Ma^{ty} may p^{er}payse well, if we greates be made to the howse, and by this doings the perell of all be away, & great charge be followeith. And there is at hand Hampton Court, Richmond and Eltome; large howses for rooms, and good ayre; & nowe colde wether and frostes will bring helthe, wth God helpe. The rest of the howses the surveyor can name you. Written the xxiii dayes of Septemebre, 1563.

Your loving friend,

Winchester."

The Marquis died on the tenth of March, 1572, at the age of ninety-seven, "having seen," says Camden, "one hundred and three persons that were decreaded from him." He had been twice married, and by his first lady, Elizabeth, daughter of William Capel, had four sons, and as many daughters. John, who succeeded to his honour, and was ancestor of the extinct Dukes of Bolton, and the present Marquis of Winchester; Thomas; Chedoke; Giles. The daughters were Alice, married to Richard Stowell, of Cotherston, in the county of Somerset; Margaret, to Sir William Berkely; Waller, of Oldstoke, in Bucks; and Eleanor, to Richard Peckhall. His second Marchioness was Winifred, daughter of Sir John Bruges, an Alderman of London, and relict of the wealthy Sir Richard Sackville. By her had no issue.

SIR WILLIAM MAITLAND,

THIS was the eminent person whom Camden, and several other writers, in treating of ■■■ affairs of Scotland in his time, designate by the appellation of "Lidington," a corruption ■■ "Lethington," ■■■ denomination of his estate, by which, according to the ■■■ of ■■ country, ■■ ■■ commonly called. In an age when his native realm ■■ not ■■■ distinguished by bravery ■■ war than by ignorance of ■■ arts ■■ government, ■■ stood alone a most profound ■■■ politician. ■■ was the eldest son of Sir Richard Maitland, of Lethington, by Mary, daughter of ■■ Thomas Cranstoun, and ■■ heir ■■ a large patrimony; but the peculiar character of his mind ■■■■ him for ■■ enjoyment ■■ only ■■ ■■ simple comforts but of the proudest distinctions of private life. Strategem ■■■ secrecy ■■■ ■■ darling objects of his study, nor ■■■ ambition wanting to spur ■■ ■■ to the constant exertion of those inclinations. He had appeared ■■ ■■ early age in the court of the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise, widow of James ■■ Fifth, where he ■■■ such proofs of his talents for the management of public affairs, that in ■■■ she chose him for her principal secretary. It was towards the close of that year that she declared her resolution to oppose the progress of the Reformation in Scotland, and in ■■ winter of ■■ following, Maitland, who, in addition to being a protestant, had disgusted her by contradicting ■■ counsels of the French by whom ■■ was ■■ rounded, withdrew himself from her service, and joined the Lords of the Congregation, as the leaders of the Reformers began now to be called, by whom he was despatched to London to implore the aid of Elizabeth to a cause which they were endeavouring, with various success, to support by force of arms. The request was gladly granted: the Duke of Norfolk was deputed to Berwick, to negotiate on the part of the mistress with the congregation; and a treaty, for which Maitland was a commissioner, was concluded in that town on the twenty-seventh of February, 1559, O.S. In the ensuing spring the queen sent a fleet and army to Scotland, and her interference presently turned the scale in favour of the reformers. The remarkable siege of Leith; the consequent treaty of Edinburgh; and the death of the Queen Regent; were events which succeeded within a very few months: they were speedily followed by the departure of Francis the Second of France, and the arrival of his widow, the beautiful and ill-fated Mary Stuart, to mount the throne of her ancestors.

The commencement of her reign was distinguished by studied concessions to the protestants. She restored Maitland to the post of secretary; but the favour, which perhaps was bestowed on him through policy, soon found stronger motives in her discovery of the perfection of his talents for that office, and in the effect of an infinite address with which he had successfully sought to cultivate her personal esteem. He became a favourite, and had for a long time the singular good fortune to enjoy at once the unlimited confidence of the queen and of the people. The difficulty of Mary's affairs with England was necessarily the first object of her attention, and to him alone she intrusted the management of them. After her accession she sent him ambassador to Elizabeth, with whom he had to treat on the delicate subject, the pretensions of his mistress to the inheritance of the English throne. To those who have any knowledge of the character it is needless to say that such a mission must have unsuccessful, the ability which he displayed in it, his penetration of his views of the policy and characters of her ministers, convinced Mary that she had not erred in her choice. She despatched him therefore again, in 1563, to press Elizabeth to a personal interview with her, in the North of England, and he again failed. On his return the Queen persecuted by a church more intolerant, and more perilous to the interests of princes who were more doctrinaire, than that of Rome. The leaders of that infant schism which had then assumed the name of the Kirk, not only sought to deny Mary the private exercise of her own religion, but were inculcating with vehemence the right of the people to resist their rulers. Maitland, artfully avoiding the former topic, attacked the succeeding position in the general assembly with admirable skill and eloquence, and concluded by accusing the notorious Knox of sedition. A debate ensued, the reputation of which is yet cherished by the Scots of either persuasion: "It admirably displayed," says the accurate and elegant Robertson, "the talents and character of both the disputants; the sententiousness of Maitland, embellished with learning, but prone to subtlety; the vigorous understanding of Knox, delighting in bold sentiments, and superior to all fear."

In the spring of 1565, he was once more sent to London, to solicit the consent of Elizabeth to Mary's marriage with Darnley. It was refused, and he returned to Scotland with Sir James Throckmorton, whom Elizabeth instantly despatched thither to protest against it in her name. Mary, enraged at the answer, and aware that she had intended as little more than a compliment, sent orders to Maitland, when on his way to her court, to return without delay to London; to reproach Elizabeth with malice and duplicity; and to declare that his mistress was now determined that she would have no opinion but that of her own subjects to interfere with her choice. Maitland disobeyed, and repaired to her presence; convinced her of the evils likely to arise from so rude and raah a defiance ; and received her pardon and her thanks. At this period commenced the follies, the crimes, and the miseries, the unhappy Mary. In her deliberations on her future fate, during her imprisonment in Lochleven Castle, in 1567, she exerted herself to the utmost to secure to her, under certain restrictions, the possession of the Crown ; and when the Earl of Murray, lately appointed Regent, was summoned by Elizabeth in the following year to meet her commissioners at York, to justify the deposition of his Sovereign, Maitland, who was too firm a friend to her cause to be left with safety in Scotland, was unwillingly admitted by him into the number of his assistants.

The Duke of Norfolk was placed at the head of Elizabeth's commission, and it was during the progress of this mighty inquiry that the first steps were taken in that project for his marriage with the Queen of Scots, which in the end cost him his life. To Maitland, the most firm adherent to Mary, and perhaps the most acute man in Scotland, he opened his design. The secretary received it with the warmest approbation, and presently invested it with the form and substance of a profound plan of policy. It was communicated with caution to the Regent ; negotiations were privately commenced in England to secure to the countenance of the most powerful among the nobility ; great business at York was interrupted, and the method changed, by means unknown to the rest of those intrusted to conduct it ; the Duke was at a time himself in danger of disappointment, without being able to divine the cause. A matter, however, divulged to so many could not be long concealed from her. Murray, whom of all others it was least likely to be beneficial, probably betrayed her to her soon after his return to Scotland, where Maitland, undismayed by the failure of one plan to undermine the Regent's authority, weakened his party, and struck out with renewed vigour into the execution of others. No longer employed in the government, and odious to the ruling faction, he retired into Perth, to the care of the of Athol, a devoted supporter of Mary's interests, from whence he negotiated, by his emissaries, with Murray's friends, seduced several from their adherence to him. The Regent length in Maitland's liberty the extinction of power, and, having decoyed him to Stirling, procured a retainer of of Lenox to accuse him to Privy Council of being a party in the murder of Darnley. He was in the autumn of a prisoner to Edinburgh, where Kirkaldy of Grange, who governor of the castle, a person deeply concerned in the most remarkable public transactions his time, and of those whom secretly gained to Queen's party, detached him, as it by counterfeiting Murray's signature to a warrant, from persons to whose charge he been committed, and took him into his own custody in the castle. This friendly aid prevented his being brought to an immediate trial, the fatal issue to him of which was evident; and Murray, who for some private suffered Kirkaldy's conduct to unresented, within a few weeks after assassinated by a private enemy.

Maitland acquitted by a provisional council of nobles who had assembled to elect a Regent, and, on regaining his freedom, again plunged instantly into the political confusion the state. He laboured to accomplish a junction of two contending factions, and length, hopeless restoring Mary to the plenitude of her regal power, proposed that should be admitted to the sovereignty jointly with her infant son, who, on her deposition, had been placed on the vacant throne. To this end he, in concert with Kirkaldy, procured a conference between the leaders of the hostile parties, which in tumultuous indecision. It was a hour Maitland. He found himself obliged to declare openly for the Queen, or for her son, and with little deliberation, because of time scarcely room for any, length appeared publicly for former, and joined in issuing a proclamation, asserting her authority in bold and explicit terms. In the mean time the Earl of Lenox, father of the murdered Darnley, was chosen Regent by the opposite party, aided by the influence of Elizabeth, and one of the first acts of his authority was to deprive Maitland of the office of secretary, and to proclaim him a traitor. The rage of contention was now at the highest pitch : each party had an army under the walls of Edinburgh, and each, at the same time, held a Parliament, the one in that city, the other at Stirling : the assembly which met under that name on the behalf of the King, in spite of Kirkaldy, who was not only governor of the castle, but provost of the town, passed an act of attainder against many of its opponents, in which Maitland was included.

These matters occurred in 1570, and the succeeding year (towards the close of which the regent Lenox was killed at Stirling in a furious and romantic surprise of that town by Kirkaldy), the Earl of Mar, a nobleman of excellent character, whose endeavours to promote concord had procured him universal esteem, was chosen by the King's adherents to succeed him. In that spirit he opened a treaty with Maitland and Kirkaldy, in which all the parties seem to have been actuated by a sincere desire to heal the wounds of their country, and it was on the point of conclusion when the subtle and unprincipled ambition of James Morton rendered it abortive. Morton, a bitter enemy of Mary, a purchased friend to Elizabeth, and a disappointed candidate for the crown, at length obtained that office on the twenty-ninth of October, 1572, on the demise of Mar, who is said to have died of a broken heart. He held Maitland in the utmost abhorrence, but a secret wish to separate more widely the Queen's party, which was already somewhat disunited, induced him to renew with Maitland and his friends the negotiation which himself had interrupted with Mar. Maitland was then deeply engaged in forming a plan for the escape of his mistress from the captivity in which the fears and the injustice of Elizabeth had so long retained her. He agreed to the treaty with the view of making it subservient to his design, but Morton, by his subtlety and penetration, as well as in his love of political rule, discovered his motive, and determined on his ruin. Morton shut himself up with Kirkcaldy in the castle of Edinburgh, where Morton, with the aid of English troops, laid close siege, and after prodigies of valour performed by the gallant defenders, reduced it on the twenty-ninth of May, 1573. Kirkcaldy surrendered to Sir William Drury, who commanded the troops, under a solemn engagement that his lives should be spared; but the former was shortly after hanged on the Cross in Edinburgh; and Maitland, who could find no hope of mercy but in his share in a promise already dishonestly broken, said to have died by his hand on the ninth of the succeeding month.

The political conduct of this extraordinary person usually taxed, it is difficult to discover what grounds, with his subtlety and sordid versatility. He appears, on the contrary, to have been the only public man of his country who remained invariably true to the interests of Mary. Archbishop Spotswood, a warm friend to the contrary party, says, "A man he was of deep wit, great experience, and one whose counsels were held in great time for oracles; but variable and inconstant; turning and changing from one faction to another, as he thought it to make for his standing. This greatly diminished his reputation, and ruined him at last," &c. Dr. Robertson, in the following passage, gives us a character probably with some candour—"His early applied public business admirable talents, improved by an acquaintance with the liberal arts; and at a time of life when his countrymen of the same quality were following the pleasures of the chase, or serving as adventurers in the armies of France, he was admitted into all the secrets of the cabinet, and put upon a level with persons of the most consummate experience in the management of affairs. He possessed in an eminent degree that intrepid spirit which delights in pursuing bold designs, and was no less master of that political dexterity which is necessary for carrying them on with success: but these qualities were deeply tinged with the neighbouring vices: his address degenerated sometimes into cunning; his sentences bordered upon excess; his invention, over fertile, suggested to him on some occasions chimerical systems of policy too refined for the genius of his age or country; and his enterprising spirit engaged him in projects vast and splendid, but beyond [REDACTED] power to execute. All the contemporary writers, to whatever [REDACTED] they belong, mention him with an admiration which nothing could have excited but the greatest superiority of penetration and abilities."

Sir William Maitland was twice married; first to Janet Menteth, by whom he [REDACTED] no issue; secondly, to Mary, daughter of Malcomb, third Lord Fleming, who brought him an only son, James, in whom this line of the family became extinct. From Sir John Maitland, next and younger brother to the subject of the preceding sketch, who attained to the office of High Chancellor of Scotland, and was created Lord Maitland by James the Sixth, the Earls of Lauderdale are descended.

JAMES HAMILTON,

■■■■ OF ARRAN, ■■■■ CHATELNERACTY.

THIS illustrious personage, whom ■ respect chiefly to high blood, unblemished integrity, and an amiable disposition, tended to place in the supreme government of his country at an epoch when it called for the rule of ■ politician at once subtle and daring, and perhaps capable even of relaxing ■ occasionally from the strictness of just moral principles, ■ the eldest son of James, the first Earl of Arran of his family, by his third wife, Janet, daughter of Sir David Bontoun, Comptroller of Scotland. His grandfather was James, second ■ Hamilton, and his grandmother the Princess Mary, eldest daughter ■ King James the Second of Scotland, ■ whose first husband, Thomas Boyd, the Earldom of Arran, afterwards granted to the issue of her second marriage, had been conferred.

■ succeeded to his father's dignities and great ■ in 1529, and ■ lived for several years ■ as much privacy as his rank could allow, when ■ untimely death of James the Fifth, in 1542, ■ few days before the birth of ■ only child, afterwards ■ celebrated Mary, demanded the ■ appointment of a Regent. Competitors were ■ wanting. Mary of Guise, the Queen Dowager, who was by no means deficient in the ambition ■ distinguished her family, preferred a claim then of ■ hope, and Cardinal Beaton, in addition to the pretensions founded on ■ great talents and long experience in public affairs, produced a will of doubtful authenticity, which he affirmed was left by the deceased King, and in which [redacted] expressly designated [redacted] that high office. The nobility, however, utterly averse on the one hand to the rule of a foreigner, and equally jealous on the [redacted] of a churchman, not only entirely, devoted to the Papal See but of the most haughty and aspiring character, determined to offer [redacted] to Arran, who was in fact presumptive heir to the throne, through the descent above stated, and he accepted it, but not without hesitation.

The period of this election, which took place at the close of the year 1542, was perhaps the most important and critical to be found in the history of Scotland. Henry, whose influence in that country was before very formidable, considered the simultaneous events of his terrible victory at Solway Moss, the death of the King, and the succession of an infant in the cradle, as sure pledges of his future sovereignty. He commenced a treaty of peace with the Scots in the spirit of a conqueror and a tyrant, demanding not only that the royal [redacted] should be betrothed [redacted] his son, Prince Edward, but that her person should be placed in his custody, and the government of her realm committed to his charge during her nonage. To these arbitrary and degrading conditions Arran would cheerfully have submitted, [redacted] Henry neglected [redacted] conciliate him by the most splendid temptations, among which was the offer of the Princess Elizabeth's hand [redacted] eldest son, but [redacted] spirit of the nation [redacted] bursting into a flame, and, as it kindled, the resolution of the Regent [redacted]. A treaty however was concluded, the terms of which, though considerably softened as to the points which were most odious, were still esteemed to be unreasonably partial to the English interest. Bestown, whom the Regent [redacted] lately for a time imprisoned, to prevent his resistance to the negotiation, [redacted] liberated towards [redacted] conclusion, publicly condemned it with the utmost exertions of that powerful understanding and undaunted courage for which he was remarkable ; and augmented, skilfully arrayed, the party disapproving nobles clergy : meanwhile Abbot Paisley, Arran's natural brother, a staunch supporter of Papacy, and an earnest friend to the influence in Scotland, privately practised on hopes and his fears, no other effect however than confirming, if may be said, irresolution. In distracted mind, on twenty-fifth August, 1543, he signed a ratification of the treaty England ; and on the third of succeeding month, in a secret meeting with the Cardinal, pledged himself to do his utmost to render it ineffectual, and to devote himself to the support of the interests of France.

Not more consistency to be found in his religious principles. The reformation in Scotland owed much to his encouragement : he had professed that faith with seal ; forwarded a bill in the Parliament to allow the translation of the Scriptures ; and more than of the most eminent protestant preachers of country lived in his family. Yet, through the persuasions the threats of the Cardinal, he publicly abjured it in the winter of this year in the Franciscan church at Stirling. These miserable vacillations rendered him the object at once of domestic and foreign attacks. The of Lenox, descended also from the royal stock, was inclined to dispute with him for the Regency, actually raised troops with which he marched Edinburgh for that purpose ; but while Beaton craftily amused Lenox with negotiation, most part of army away, and the remnant was routed in the field. Henry, on the other hand, enraged beyond measure, made a furious inroad into Scotland ; Arran implored and obtained the of France ; and, while matters were passing, Cardinal, whom circumstances rendered chief adviser, as well his formidable rival, was by a assassination in castle of St. Andrew's, where he had for time detained the Regent's heir, as an hostage for father's submission to his will. To regain young nobleman, as well as to make a decent show of resentment towards the murderers of the Cardinal, whom however he had secretly hated, the Regent ineffectually besieged [redacted] for five months, when a treaty ensued, [redacted] neither party [redacted]. The assassins engaged to restore his son, and to surrender the castle, on his procuring for them from the Pope an absolution of the murder, and from the [redacted] a pardon; in the mean time they were secretly supported by Henry, to whom they had promised that they would resist to the last extremity; while the Regent, on [redacted] part, had applied to France for more skilful military aid than Scotland then possessed, for the purpose of reducing them, [redacted] in [redacted] occurred soon after [redacted] arrival.

Before the conclusion of this siege Henry expired. His death [redacted] the signal for a war, which perhaps he himself had meditated. The demand [redacted] he had sternly made of the young Queen as a consort for his son and successor, Prince Edward, [redacted] [redacted] peremptorily repeated by the Protector Somerset, in Scotland, and at the head of a powerful army. It was rejected, even with disdain, for the anger of the Scottish nobility was raised to the highest pitch by this outrage, and the Regent joined them with an air of firmness and decision secretly dictated by his engagements to France. [redacted] terrible overthrow at Musselburgh which succeeded on the tenth of September, 1547, seemed to render a strict alliance with that country even necessary to the preservation of any degree of [redacted] independence; the nation readily claimed [redacted] protection; and England, in gaining a signal victory, defeated [redacted] very object for which she had fought. The Regent now, with almost general approbation, not only offered the hand of the infant Mary to the Dauphin, afterwards Francis the Second, [redacted] proposed that she [redacted] immediately [redacted] to [redacted] Court [redacted] Paris, to receive her education under the direction of the King, who, on his part, engaged to assist Scotland with a powerful military force. A treaty to these, and other [redacted] [redacted] concluded early in the spring of 1548, and France obtained, through concessions purely gratuitous, all that England lately sued and fought for in vain. The French King overwhelmed the Scots with proofs of gratitude, and Arran himself, with his usual imprudence, accepted him the Duke of Chatelherault, and a pension of thirty thousand livres, together the order St. Michael, collar appears on the portrait.

The army promised by Henry the Second of France arrived after in Scotland, but Somerset, whose power was in the wane, unable to undertake another invasion, his great rival Dudley, succeeding to the government of England, resolved to make a peace with the Scots. The treaty for that purpose renounced in express terms the claim of the marriage, and in other respects so favourable the wishes of Scotland, that no doubt could be reasonably entertained of a repose of some years; the French troops therefore re-embarked. Peace however produced usual consequences in Scotland, a revival of intrigues and factions. The Queen Dowager, availing herself of the newly established amity and intercourse with France, laid plans to possess herself of the Regency. Since the death of the Cardinal, she had engaged in the direction of the with increasing boldness and assiduity, and the patience with which allowed her interference, and listened to her dictates, suggested to her a strong hope that might be induced to a voluntary resignation. The deficiencies of nature, which too glaring to be concealed, the ill his had gradually rendered him unpopular, Mary had laboured, and with considerable effect, gain the good opinion of the country, nor she neglected to aggravate prejudices conceived against him. Having her scheme, aided by the counsel of her aspiring family, obtain which she a visit to Paris, she prevailed Robert Carnegy Panter, Bishop Ross, two of chief advisers, whom she had gained to interest, to make the overture to him in the name the King of France. These persons, who well knew how to address themselves to the foibles, terrified him with threats of the resentment that Monarch, as well as the Queen Dowager, and represented him with the force her popularity and power, and the disgust which late public misfortunes had inspired against his rule. On the other hand, they promised him, as the price of his resignation, the settlement by France of his heirs; a splendid increase of his pension; a declaration by Parliament of his right to succeed to the Throne, and of a favourable allowance of his conduct in the Regency. He gave way, without hesitation, Mary arrived in France to take the reins of government, when an obstacle to her views, perhaps not wholly unforeseen, presented itself. His brother, late Abbot of Paisley, who had been raised by him to the primacy on the death of the Cardinal, lay during this singular negotiation at the utmost extremity of illness. Suddenly recovered, he flew to the Court, and, with equal judgment and spirit, for he possessed most of the qualities of mind which his brother wanted, exhorted him to retract, and for the time prevailed. Mary however was firm. She employed once more every engine of art and power, and at length carried her point by adding to them the command of the young Queen, who was nearly twelve years old. The perseverance of the Archbishop caused a delay of several months, but in the spring of 1560 the Duke finally resigned, and the Queen Dowager assumed the Regency.

He was doomed however to be restrained during a long time by the cumbrous dignity of his birth from the enjoyment of that privacy which his nature, and perhaps his inclination, required him. In the arrangements for the royal marriage, a gross fraud had been practised to defeat the inheritance of the house of Hamilton. The Parliament, in professed concert with the Court of France, had manifested on that occasion a cautious and plain-plaining and establishing the rights of the Duke as presumptive heir to the Throne, the young Queen had been compelled by her uncles, the Princes of Lorraine, with the concurrence of Henry the Second, to sign secretly certain instruments by which she settled the Crown of Scotland, in case of issue herself, upon the heirs in succession to that of France, and any other disposition of it made, or to be made, by her might be esteemed as extorted, and therefore void. The discovery, or suspicion, of this iniquitous proceeding, especially as it immediately followed by an act of the Scottish Parliament conferring on the Dauphin for an equal partnership in the Sovereignty, and in the surviving the Queen, the whole, together with the title of King of Scotland, roused the Duke's indolent spirit, and induced him to attach himself to a party which readily elected him its nominal leader. The heads of the reformers, to whom their followers had lately given the title of "Lords of the Congregation," indignant at deceptions which had been practised on them by the Queen Regent, were now arrayed in firm opposition to her measures, or, in other words, to the French interest, and he joined them with much show of ardour. Instigated much by the artifices of Elizabeth, who had of late mounted the English Throne, and by their resentment, they appeared in arms in 1559; and having appointed him their General, proclaimed the deposition of the Queen Regent. The eminent success which in the end crowned the efforts of this faction was then but dawning; the checks and impediments which seldom attend the commencement of great public changes were the Duke with doubts and terrors; and he seized the favourable opportunity of retreating from the too arduous service which he had unwarily undertaken.

His resentment at France invaded his retirement. He was deprived of his pension, and his Dukedom was threatened; but a greater evil seemed to be approaching. Mary, now a widow, returned to Scotland, and mounted a throne which she unhappily resolved to partake with Darnley;

mighty of the family of his rival, Lenox, the Duke foreboded the extinction of all hope of the succession in his own. He joined the faction which, led by of Murray, the Queen's illegitimate brother, had to oppose the marriage, and the country with it before Queen's superior strength. He resided long France, and from thence besought her pardon with the deepest humility, and with difficulty obtained it. There he remained during the enormities and vicissitudes of the three succeeding years, which marked by the dethronement and captivity of Mary, and the appointment of Murray Regency. While that nobleman employed in 1568, at York and at Westminster, in that great discussion of the conduct of his mistress which had been with solemn mockery instituted by Elizabeth, the friends of Mary were secretly active at home in her behalf. The Duke returned, bringing with a sum, supplied by the Court of France, to be applied to her service. He landed in England, where by various detained him for months, but he seems to have been allowed an unrestrained intercourse with Mary, who the end of February, 1569, dispatched him to Scotland, decorated with the high-sounding title of her Lieutenant-General that country, to which she added the singular denomination her "adopted father."

had scarcely concerted his plan of operations with Earls of Argyll and Huntly, himself Queen's powerful adherents, when Murray suddenly returned, and, promptitude and decision which marked his character, raised an army, and it to Glasgow. The Duke, intimidated, and perhaps justly, instantly proposed a treaty, in which he engaged to submit to the authority of King, represented by the regency, to relinquish the faculties Mary's lately granted commission invested him; Murray stipulated for the repeal an act which had passed against some of the Queen's party; the restoration of their dignities and estates to would submit the government established; a convention, to be Edinburgh, to take into consideration of public affairs. Huntly Argyll declined to take any part negotiation, remained in arms in their respective countries, and at this precise period intelligence from France conveyed to Mary's party unexpected offers of aid. The Duke now hesitated, and the appointed conference, which Murray opened by demanding his instant signature to the terms which had been agreed on, began expostulate for unhappy Queen, when the Regent, not even deigning answer, arrested him the spot, and sent him prisoner to castle of Edinburgh, where remained the assassination of Murray, in the beginning of following year, conferred a temporary authority on Mary's party, and procured release.

Hopes were entertained agreement might be wrought between the two factions with equal justice to rights both of the Queen. Their met, but was distinguished only by mutual obstinacy, they separated but issue proclamations proscribing other. Their discord, immoderate enough in itself, fomented by Elizabeth, who an army their doors, of the first exploits of which to plunder burn Duke's palace of Hamilton. Lenox, who had been for some in London, whither he went the occasion inquiry into conduct of Mary, to accuse her of the murder of his son, returned, under the protection and with the recommendation of Elizabeth, the of Regent, to which indeed he had, in more respects than one, a sort of natural claim. He was placed in that great office the of July, 1570, and commenced his exercise of by proclaiming the Duke, and other great leaders of Queen's party, traitors, enemies to their country. In a of malice utterly unworthy of his high birth and office, and indeed of the reputation for good dispositions for which he had credit, he marched in person to Hamilton, ■ the head of three hundred horse, and, seizing the most precious remnants of the Duke's plate, and other moveables, ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ been saved from the late devastation, sold them publicly at the Market Cross of Linlithgow. Early in the ensuing year, ■ brought the Archbishop of St. Andrews, who had ■ ■ ■ into ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ by the surrender of Dunbarton Castle, in which ■ had taken refuge, ■ ■ ■ nominal trial for high treason, in ■ ■ ■ issue of which he was, with scandalous partiality, condemned to be hanged.

The execution of this sentence, more especially as he was the first prelate who had ever suffered death in Scotland through a form of justice, enraged the dependents of his family almost to madness, and indeed offended the whole body of the people. The Queen's party took advantage of this disposition; and the Duke, with other noblemen who were staunch to her interest, took possession of ■ capital with an armed force, and on the twelfth of June, 1571, called a Parliament, in which her authority was implicitly recognised. Lenox, on the other hand, ■ ■ ■ his Parliament ■ Stirling, which denounced the Duke, and almost the whole house of Hamilton, ■ traitors, and declared their ■ ■ ■ forfeited. ■ ■ ■ disorders followed. ■ ■ ■ Queen's ■ ■ ■ surprised Stirling, and Lenox fell in ■ ■ ■ tumult. ■ ■ ■ of Mar, his successor, died about a year after his appointment; and ■ ■ ■ dark, ambitious, and treacherous Morton ■ ■ ■ length elected to the Regency. Morton, the Duke's ■ ■ ■ relation by marriage, who was distinguished by a cold and calculating policy, wholly free from the influence of any passion, applied himself to the natural defects of the ■ ■ ■ character, and the increasing infirmities of his age. Affecting to bury all causes of discord in oblivion, and to pay the most profound respect to his adversary's high birth and honourable motives, he simply proposed a treaty, the terms of which comprehended every provision that the Duke himself could have devised for the security of his person and interests. ■ ■ ■ was eagerly

MATTHEW PARKER,

OF CANTERBURY.

THE Church of England ■■■ perhaps ■■■ to this wise ■■■ good man than to any of the reformers who preceded him, ■■■ who may have left a higher fame. They razed ■■■ foundation the vast and venerable edifice ■■■ ancient religion, and hastily erected in its stead a pile of discordant materials, without strength or symmetry ; he cemented the ■■■ parts, smoothed irregularities, ■■■ supplied deficiencies. They ■■■ the slaves of a furious and interested tyrant, and of their own yet baser interests ; he the honest and incorrupt ■■■ of a prudent sovereign, and the faithful minister of Christianity. They had incurred the suspicion of many by eagerly adopting a new system of faith ; he gained ■■■ confidence of all by strenuously supporting that in which he had been bred. Their career had been marked by force and persecution ; his was distinguished by patience and benignity.

He was born in the parish of St. Saviour, in Norwich, on ■■■ sixth of August, 1504, eldest of the three sons of William Parker, a citizen and woollen manufacturer of that town, ■■■ of a gentleman's family, or, in other words, ■■■ a family bearing armorial ensigns. His mother was Alice, a ■■■ from ■■■ respectable house of Monyns, of ■■■ Kent. He was ■■■ for the ■■■ profession, ■■■ in his father's house, ■■■ University of Cambridge, where he was admitted in September, 1522, the twentieth of the ensuing March was chosen a scholar of Bene't, now Corpus Christi College, a foundation which offered some peculiar advantages to young men born in that city. He remained at Cambridge for twelve years; he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1525, and in 1527 was ordained deacon and priest, elected a fellow of his college, and created master of arts. It is almost needless to observe that the universities at that period ostensibly submitted themselves to the doctrines and the discipline of the Church of Rome; but the Reformation was dawning, and Parker was one of many Protestant divines, afterwards of great eminence, who met, with little more secrecy than was required by the decorum, to pave the way for its progress. This disposition, joined to the fame which he had acquired, not only for his talents and erudition, but as an admirable preacher, attracted the notice of the court, and in 1535 he was suddenly and unexpectedly summoned thither, to take on himself the office of a domestic chaplain to Anne Boleyn, by whom he was soon after presented to the deanery of the college of Stoke Newington, in Suffolk.

After the death of that unfortunate lady, he was retained by Henry as one of his own chaplains. In 1538 he took the degree of doctor in divinity; in 1541 obtained a prebend at Ely, and a rectory in that diocese; and in 1544 was elected master of Bene't College, and soon after Vice-Chancellor of the University, which office he served again in the year 1547. Under Edward VI. he was appointed a prebendary at Lincoln, and in the month of July, 1552, was elected Dean of that church. In the following year Mary deprived him of all his preferments, but suffered him to remain unmolested in his obscurity during her reign.

Elizabeth, on her accession, committed chiefly to Sir Nicholas Bacon, her Lord Keeper, and Cecil, afterwards celebrated Lord Burghley, the arduous task of superintending the infant ecclesiastical establishment. The former of those great men had been the intimate friend and fellow collegian of Parker, probably recommended to the Queen's especial favour; the raising him, without intermediate steps, to exalted dignity which awaited him, have been the result of her own judgment of his character, and her private determination. The see of Canterbury had been for nearly a year vacant, when, on the ninth of December, 1558, signified to Parker the Queen's design to advance him to a bishopric, which he declined. He was again and again summoned to London by the Lord Keeper and Secretary, but, under various pretences, constantly refused. A curious trait of the simplicity and superstition of that time that Bacon should have ascribed, as appears by Parker's to one of that minister's letters, his backwardness to a dread inspired by a prophecy of Nostradamus; undoubtedly, however, it flowed from the modesty and humility of the ; and Nolo Episcopari perhaps never in any other instance uttered with such sincerity of heart.—“What with passing hard years of Mary's reign,” says he, in one of his letters to Cecil, published by Strype, “in obscurity, without conference, or such matter of study I might do service; and what with my natural vitiosity of overmuch shamefacedness; I am so in myself that I raise up my heart and stomach to utter in with others with my pen I can express indifferently without great difficulty.” At length, on the twenty-eighth of May, he received the Queen's positive command to repair to her presence, which he obeyed, and received from her nomination to Primacy; but his consecration deferred till the seventeenth of December, it may be worth observing the private and simple manner in which the ceremony was conducted on that occasion a silly report, which Catholics industriously propagated, that it was performed in a tavern in Cheapside. was revived by the fanatics, in the beginning of the grand rebellion; great pains were taken by some churchmen to the story of the Nag's consecration, as it was called; and they proved by positive evidence that it took place in the archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth.

Parker's first care was to secure ~~the~~ independence ~~of~~ the new hierarchy. An ~~act~~ had passed in ~~the~~ late Parliament to enable the Queen, on the vacation of any bishopric, to appropriate to herself such part of its temporalities as she might choose to possess, and to give in exchange such portions of abbey lands, or other estates vested in the Crown, as she might deem equivalent. Convinced that ~~no~~ establishment could be safe whose governors must be subject either to the absolute control of the crown, or to the reproach of poverty, he laboured earnestly with Elizabeth to persuade her to relinquish this right; and, though she exercised ~~it~~ with respect to ~~the~~ own see soon after he was appointed to preside ~~in~~ it, in a great measure finally succeeded. ~~He~~ swept away gradually, and with a gentle hand, the numerous remains of the Romish system which yet clung to the church, and, to render ~~his~~ efforts palatable to the people, began with the Queen ~~himself~~. Elizabeth, who still prostrated herself, in her chapel and in ~~the~~ closet, before ~~a~~ crucifix, and was firmly averse ~~to~~ the marriage of priests, yielded those prejudices ~~to~~ the arguments ~~of~~ ~~himself~~. He defended the Reformation with equal zeal ~~in~~ in ~~a~~ correspondence with the ejected ~~prelates~~. Prelates, and engaged warmly with Calvin in forming ~~a~~ plan for the uniformity of faith and discipline among Protestants throughout Europe, the ~~execution~~ of which ~~was~~ unhappily prevented by the death of that extraordinary man, whose fame has been unjustly sullied by the subsequent extravagances of the sect which derives its name from him; for Calvin himself was averse neither to monarchy nor episcopacy.

At length it became necessary, for the ~~establishment~~ of the reformed faith, and of an ecclesiastical polity, on known laws, to summon a synod or convocation, which met on the twelfth of January, 1562. In that assembly Parker proposed the thirty-nine articles which form the code of the church

England, which may be considered in a great measure as the author; and they were, after the most grave minute deliberation, enacted. Elizabeth's second Parliament on the _____ day, its _____ employment was to pass an act "for the assurance of the Queen's power over all estates." This statute peculiarly aimed at the Papal pretensions, and the oath of supremacy, which _____ framed by _____ preceding Parliament, _____ recited in it, and imperatively prescribed to many descriptions of persons, but particularly the clergy, under the penalty of a premunire for the _____ refusal, and of the laws against high treason for _____ second. The Archbishops _____ Bishops _____ appointed to administer this oath to ecclesiastics; but Parker foresaw the misery which must follow the rigorous exaction of it, and turned with horror from an engine which could be worked only amidst persecution and bloodshed. He wrote, therefore, a letter to be circulated with the utmost secrecy among his brother prelates, which, with much difficulty, he obtained the Queen's consent, exhorting them not in any _____ to tender the oath a second time, but, on one refusal, to leave the contumacious party to be dealt with by himself. This excellent letter concluded thus—"Praying your Lordship not to interpret mine advertisement as tending to shew myself a patron for the easing of such evil-hearted subjects which, for divers of them, do bear a perverse stomach to the parity _____ religion, and to _____ state of the realm, thus by God's providence quietly repose; and which also do envy the continuance of _____ all, so placed by the Queen's favour as _____ be; but only in respect of a fatherly and pastoral care, which _____ in us, which be heads of _____ flocks, not _____ follow _____ private _____ hearts, but to provide, _____ Deo et hominibus, for saving and winning of others, if it may be obtained." _____ the end, through his perseverance in this merciful course, _____ frightful law became nearly a dead letter, _____ the oath _____ administered _____ of _____ Popish prelates, or other clergy, except the odious Bonner. Through this, and many other moderation and beneficence towards the unfortunates, actually acquired their love. Tonstall, Thirlaby, deprived Bishops of Durham and Norwich, Boxall, of Windsor, and others, whom the Privy Council thought to commit to his custody, passed the latter years of their lives in his houses, enjoying a tranquillity perhaps before unknown to them, guests to his hospitality, and prisoners only to their own gratitude.

From the Romanists, by past severity exceeding conciliation, the Church of England had much to dread, when from her own bosom issued a host of enemies yet more formidable. These were the Puritans, as they were then called, whom we have since split into so many sects of various denominations. Originally without any specific design, and animated by the simple operation of discontent and folly, they fell furiously on the caps, and hoods, and tippets, of the churchmen, and by outcry, uttered in the foulest language that ever disgraced the pulpit or the press, at length necessarily called forth the attention of the Primate. He renewed his endeavours to establish an uniformity of worship, and his interference proved but the signal for new murmurs. All the exterior decencies of devotion were reviled as remnants of popery, and ecclesiastical property was viewed merely as the means of supporting spiritual pride. These people, for their chief patron the abandoned of Leicester, and the bickerings which followed between that unworthy favourite and Parker tended much to embitter the remainder of the good man's life. The Archbishop, however, in concert with other members of the ecclesiastical commission, composed in 1549 certain articles respecting the public administration of the sacraments, and the apparel of the clergy, but the Privy Council, on instigation of Leicester, refused to confirm them, and was therefore obliged to publish them on his own authority, and they were utterly disregarded. These articles were deeply engaged in superintending edition of the Scriptures which was known by the name of the Bishops' Bible, because he had allotted a portion to each of the Bishops for his revision and correction, reserving to himself the control of the whole.

Ten years of an excellent prelate's life were passed between vain endeavours to prevent the ascendancy of the Puritans, and to ward off the blows aimed at himself by the courtiers who supported them. Continually thwarted in the execution of his high functions; maligned by a multiplicity of enemies; his credit undermined with the people, and, through the intrigues of Leicester and others, failing with the Queen; he lived in fact under a persecution, and was perhaps saved by death from undeserved impeachment, at least disgrace. Within a few weeks even before his departure, and probably while he laboured under his last illness, a virulent and wholly undisguised attack was made on him, by printing a translation of the section relating to himself, in a small history in Latin of Bene't College and its successive Masters, preserved in manuscript in that house, and stuffing it with the most scurrilous ribaldry in the shape of notes. The character of this vile and vulgar publication may be fairly inferred from the title—"The life off the 70 Archbishopp off Canterbury, presentlve settinge, englished, and now added to the lately sett forth in Latin. This number off seventy is so compleat a number as it is great pitie ther should be one more; but that as Augustin was the first, so Mathew might be the last." This may serve as a specimen of the innumerable pamphlets of the same kind by which he was assailed about that time.

Archbishop Parker had long been afflicted by a stone, in March, 1575, experienced a terrible attack of that complaint, which continued for several weeks with little intermission. During his illness he wrote many letters to the Queen and Burghley on the state of the Church, with a fervency which his pains of death increased. His last letter to the Treasurer concludes with a prayer for the

WALTER DEVEREUX,

In a reign abounding with historical anomalies ■■■ noble-■■■ story is pre-eminently remarkable. Loyal ■■ enthusiasm, but alighted by his Sovereign; of the most spotless honour and integrity, but never trusted; equally distinguished by ■■■ skill and bravery in the military profession, ■■ which ■■■ had dedicated his life, and uniformly checked in every enterprise ■■ proposed; uniting ■■ his veins the highest blood of the land, and subjected ■■ the mortifying control of inferiors, in ■■ age too when illustrious birth usually furnished the strongest claim to respect: he sunk into the grave at an early age, at once an ornament and ■■ disgrace to his time, leaving a ■■■ memorial of disregarded merits, and unrequited services.

His birth ■■■ indeed very noble, for he descended mater-nally from the great Houses of Ferrers, Bourchier, ■■■ Grey, from ■■ ■■ ■■ which his paternal ■■■ ■■■ the Barony of Ferrers of Chartley: his grandfather, Walter, Lord Ferrers, ■■■ born by ■■■ ■■■ ■■■ ■■■ title of Viscount Hereford; his father, Sir Richard Devereux, who ■■■ not live ■■ enjoy the titles, took ■■ wife Dorothy, daughter of George Hastings, ■■■ of Huntingdon, and he was the eldest son of that marriage. ■■ was ■■■
■■■ ■■ year 1540, and succeeded to ■■ honours ■■■ ■■■ ■■ family in the nineteenth year of his ■■ on ■■ ■■■ ■■ grandfather. ■■ good sense, ■■ politeness, and his learning—for he had been excellently educated,—placed him, for a time, so high in Elizabeth's favour, that she once styled him, in a letter under her own hand, "the rare jewel of her realm, and the bright ornament of her nobility." ■■■ was anxious however to build his fame on a larger basis than the graces and accomplishments of a courtier, and eagerly seized the opportunity which ■■■ rebellion in the North of 1569 offered to him, at once to render a signal service to his Sovereign, and ■■■ establish a military reputation. On that occasion, he joined the Queen's forces with a considerable body of troops, raised and equipped at ■■■ own charge, and so contributed materially to the speedy dispersion of the insurgents. He received an especial, though rather deferred, reward, for in 1572 the Earldom of Essex, a dignity which formerly had been held by his ancestors, the Bouchiers, was conferred on him, and that service is particularly ■■■■ in the preamble to his patent. ■■■■ thought ■■■ to distinguish his creation by unusual ceremonies, which she concluded by girding ■■■ sword, ■■■ placing the coronet on his head, with her own hands. About the same time she gave him the order of the Garter.

In the succeeding year he was enabled to put into practice a plan which, though probably long considered, was ■■■■ distinguished by its prudence than by a generous spirit of enterprise. Ireland was then the only scene of military operations, and a fierce insurrection reigned, particularly in Ulster. ■■■■ prevailed ■■■ the Queen to permit him to volunteer ■■■ services there, under a very singular agreement. ■■■■ Mac Phelim, ■■■■ frequently called "the great O'Neil," a powerful chief, had possessed himself of the most part of the district ■■■ Clanbughboy, in that province, from which ■■■ Earl undertook to dislodge him, on condition that ■■■■ grant ■■■ conquerors and their commander, one half of the subdued district, for the defence of which ■■■ stipulated to maintain, at his own charge, ■■■ hundred horse, and four hundred foot; and, to furnish himself with the means, he borrowed ten thousand pounds of the Queen, on mortgage of his estate in Essex. It has been said, and there [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] to doubt it, that the Queen's [REDACTED] to [REDACTED] romantic expedition was obtained chiefly through the intercession of his enemy, Leicester, who watched his growing favour with a jealous eye, and [REDACTED] [REDACTED] every artifice to [REDACTED] and encourage his inclination, and to procure the dispatch to distance of a rival whom he dreaded. Essex, although perhaps as much distinguished by an acute penetration as by the noble simplicity of his mind, [REDACTED] to have been unconscious of this design to the last; but he foresaw other difficulties, and set out on his journey with a heavy heart. The two following letters to the Treasurer Burghley, from the originals in [REDACTED] [REDACTED] collection, while they prove that fact, will be found to throw a strong, and very advantageous light on [REDACTED] Earl's character: we find, too, in the [REDACTED] [REDACTED] inconsiderable proof of [REDACTED] wisdom of Elizabeth.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR L.

I have passed [REDACTED] assurance of vth land to [REDACTED] Quene's Ma^{ty}, after suche sort as her Ma^{ty} Counsell hath devised, as [REDACTED] [REDACTED] unto you by M^r Attorney's certificat. I shall [REDACTED] desyre your L. to send your warrant to [REDACTED] Thom's [REDACTED] for delyvery of the moneys unto [REDACTED] My L. Chamberlen told [REDACTED] yesterday that he hath sent unto your L. the [REDACTED] touching comission for gov^{rn}ement of the contrey for a tyme, and of those I carry wth me. I praye your L. after you have considered of them to direct your warrant for the making of the comission. Yf your L. do not come shortly unto the Court, I shall desyre you to wryte to my L. Chamberlen, and my Lord of Leicester, to farther my dispatche. I have verie greate busynesse to do in the contrey after I have done here, and therefore wold I be gladlie dispatched hence. I meane not to tarry long after [REDACTED] patent and comission are sealed.

I here y^t your L. rides to your house at Burghley. I desyre that I maye knowe the tyme of your returne to the Court, or to your house ■■■■■. Yf your L. do not returne before the last of this monethe, I will then wayte uppon you at Burghley. I do, my Lord, make my reconyng of your L. to be my assured pillar; and if I did not hope that, assuredlie I wold not have taken the journey in hand, if the Quene had given me the x thousand pounds she lent me. I loke for to ■■■■ enymyes enoughe to this enterpryse, and I feele ■■■■ of them alreadye. I praye your L. that you will, when your leysure will serve you, set downe what course you thinck beste for me to take for the order of these people I carry wth me, and fynd there. As I do onely repose my trust uppon you, so will I be only directed by you.

When your L. wrytes unto my Lord Deputie of Ireland I praye you that you will desyre his favour and furtherance to me in this enterpryse. He shall fynd me as ready to do any service there to her Majestie, undermeth him, and to get any honour unto him, as he ■■■■ fynd any ■■■■ ■■■■ gentleman whom I have ev^{er} loved, and lyked well of, and I have good hope I shall fynd him my frend; and yet some suspic^{ion} have I had of late of yt, by reason of some speche that hath passed from his nere frende.

Thus, resting ev^{er} at yo^r L.' comandement, I ■■■■ comyt you to ■■■■ Lord. From Darresme Place, this xxii of June, 1573.

Your Lordship's at comanndement,

W. EMEX.

MAY BE PLEASE YOUR L.

Yesterday I was at the Courte, and dyd take my leave of her Ma^{ty}. She hath signed all my books, and I am dep^ted from her Ma^{ty} wth verie good words, and promyse of her favour and furtherance to this enterpryse. Uppon the taking of my leave, she told me that she had two speciall things to advise me of: the one was that I should have considerac^{on} of the Irishe there, whiche she thought had become her disobedient subjects rather because they have not byn defended from the force [REDACTED] the Scottis than for any other cause. Her Ma^{ty} opynion was that, ~~uppon~~ my comyng, they wold yeld themselves good subjects, and therefore wyshe them [REDACTED] well used. To this, my L., I answered that I determyned to deale so wth them as I shuld fynd beste for her service when I came there; and, for the present, I could not saye what is beste [REDACTED] done; [REDACTED] this her Ma^{ty} shold be sure of; that I wold [REDACTED] imbrue my hands wth more [REDACTED] than the necessitie of [REDACTED] cause requireth. The other speciall matter [REDACTED] I [REDACTED] not seek too hastily to bring people that hathe byn tryned in another religion from [REDACTED] wth they have been brought [REDACTED] in. To this, I answered that, for the present, I thought it [REDACTED] best [REDACTED] lerne them to knowe ther aliegence [REDACTED] her Ma^{ty}, and to yeld her their due obedience; and, after they had lerned that, they would be easily brought to be of good religion. Muche more speeches besids passed betwene her Ma^{ty} and me, whiche were of no greate importance, and therefore I wryte them not [REDACTED] yo^r L.

I am, my L., dep^ted from the Court wth many good and fayre promises of diverse, but of the p^rformance of them I knows not what [REDACTED] I may make. I repose my onlie [REDACTED] uppon your L. Your honorable dealing wth me, both in this, [REDACTED] at [REDACTED] tymes before, hathe byn suche [REDACTED] hath bound [REDACTED] to [REDACTED] at your L.' comandement. And so I rest, and humbly take my leave of yo^r L. From Duresmo House, this xxth of Julie, 1572.

At your L.' comandement,

W. Essex.

On the [REDACTED] [REDACTED] August following he embarked [REDACTED] Liverpool, accompanied by the Lords Darcy and Rich, and many other persons of distinction, together with a multitude of volunteers of inferior rank, who followed his fortune in [REDACTED] hope of mending their own. They were disappointed, [REDACTED] abandoned [REDACTED] [REDACTED] after his arrival in Ireland, and [REDACTED] was the [REDACTED] [REDACTED] long series [REDACTED] misfortunes which attended his expedition. Weakened by their defection, ■ brought ■ Queen to ■ him prosecute the service in her name, and under her command, and offered to discharge a moiety of ■ expense from ■ own purse, but his request was ■ ■ applied ■ Sussex, Leicester, and Burghley, ■ induce ■ to aid his diminished force with one hundred horses, and six hundred foot, ■ that too was refused. In ■ mean time his chagrin was increased by the malice of the Lord Deputy, Fitzwilliam. Elizabeth, ■ sagacity had foreseen the pro- ■ jealousy of that officer, ■ endeavoured to ■ it by leaving to ■ ■ honour of granting ■ ■ commission, the delivery of which he contemptuously delayed for many months. When Essex received it, he ■ earnestly employed in fortifying Clanhughboy, which in fact ■ the main object of ■ plan; but the messenger brought him positive orders from the Deputy to abandon immediately that part of the island, and to pursue the Earl of Desmond. ■ obeyed, in silent grief, and had the good fortune, rather by persuasion ■ force, to reduce that formidable chief to submission. He gained great honour in this, and indeed in all the conduct of ■ first campaign; yet, says Camden, "with these actions ■ the year well nigh spent in Ireland, to no man's advantage, but ■ Essex's great damage."

Convinced, thus early, that ■ his endeavours would ■ sacrificed to the envy of the Deputy, and the ■ influence of Leicester, and doubtful of the ability of ■ force to cope with ■ enemy, ■ requested permission in ■ beginning of the following year ■ treat with their leader, and was refused. ■ then surrendered his government of Ulster, ■ ■ after suddenly obliged by the Deputy to resume it, and once more ■ march ■ from thence against the insurgents, to whom, when he unexpectedly found ■ on ■ point of subduing them, he was peremptorily instructed to offer terms of peace. ■ he obeyed. ■ ■ a treaty, ■ honour- ■ to his Sovereign and to himself; ■ again returned into Ulster, which, in ■ absence, ■ been invaded by ■

Scots. He presently dispossessed them of the of country which they had gained, and pursued them to their own islands, on which he was establishing military posts, when, without assignment of any crime, he was cruelly insult, he was deprived of his command; and required to serve at the head only of three hundred men, with the mere title of their captain. Elizabeth felt for his hardships, but indeed may be considered as having shared in his indignities;
 but, such was her blind submission to the will of the detestable Leicester, she durst not openly protect him. In the course of the vexations of that year, Burghley, whose friendship to him Essex appears to have justly estimated, vainly recommended it to her to appoint him to succeed his enemy, Fitzwilliam, in the office of Lord Deputy—a new circumstance in his story, which is communicated to us by the following letter, from an original in the collection with which before inserted, abounding with indirect allusions to the misconduct of that officer.

MY GOOD LORD,

Yt greaveth me that I shoulde so often trouble yo' L. as I doe, but necessitie doth compell me, for I finde some whoe is carefull of my selfe, or my actions, but yo' selfe. I wille not trouble your L. wth a longe disaourne of the state of things here, but wille referre you to the l^res written to my L^d. of the Counsaill.

We have expected here the cominge of M^r Henrye Sydney
 theise two monethes, but that brute beginneth now to dye.
 Suerly, my L., the daylie lookinge for of a change dothe great harme; for duringe this interim is the greatest spoile comit-ted, because all the ylle disposed now robbe and steale, hopinge the new governor will pardon all done in this tyme. I send us a settled governor, such a one as I fytle for Ireland, not Ireland fytle for him.
 This people waxe proude: yea, the best might be amended:
 all needs correction.

I understand by divers of my freinds that your L. hathe both [redacted] and laboured [redacted] place me in [redacted] unfortunate office. [redacted] [redacted] juste cause whie I should thinke my selfe more depelie bounde to you for yt, for I knowe yo' L. wishethe yt for my good; but the feare of envie, and of evill assistaunce, dothe so much discourage me to take yt, as I assure you, [redacted] L., I wishe yt rather to any man that were fytte for [redacted] then to my selfe. [redacted] knowe that as the enterteinm^t is honorable, so [redacted] charge great, and the burden hevie; and whoe shall serve the Q. and his countrye faithfullie shall have [redacted] payne a rewarde for his travaile; but, yf he wille respect [redacted] more than [redacted] Prince, countrie, or honestie, then may he make his gayne unmercifull.

Because I [redacted] shortlie send againe, I wille not trouble your L. longer, but wille conclude wth my humble thanks for the money wth yo' L. hathe p^{ro}vided me, wth I assure you was muche neded. God preserve yo' L. longe in healtie and honor. From the Newrye, the 28 August, 1674.

Your L.' most bounden,

W. Essex.

Having remonstrated in vain, both to the Queen and the Privy Council, by letters equally spirited and judicious, [redacted] [redacted] found in Collins's Sidney Papers, he returned to England in the spring of the following year. [redacted] had been long apprised of Leicester's treachery towards him, and now [redacted] vent to his indignation, with all the courage and candour which belonged to his character; yet that prodigious hypocrite not only found means to appease him, but even dared to proffer his friendship, and, in [redacted] end, persuaded Essex to grasp [redacted] the deceitful phantom. He was induced once more to return [redacted] Ireland, with general promises [redacted] better [redacted] and more extensive powers; and with the dignified but inefficient office of Earl Marshal in that kingdom, granted to him [redacted] Leicester's special entreaty. On his arrival there however he [redacted] [redacted] same baleful influence still prevailing against him. All his counsels were slighted ; all his active endeavours thwarted ; all his motives misrepresented. He survived but few months. Those who had spared no pains to blast all his views of honour and happiness, industriously reported that he died of a broken heart, or, in other words, of a dysentery produced by grief. They certainly were best qualified to draw that inference from their own conduct ; but the rumour was discredited. The strongest suspicions of poison had been excited ; and his friends, who indeed composed his nation, for no man was more generally beloved and admired, pointed with one accord at Leicester as the murderer. Three minutely particular accounts of his illness are extant in print ; the first, in a pamphlet called Leicester's Commonwealth ; the second, which has been attributed to Essex's beloved and faithful retainer, Sir Edward Waterhouse, in Hearne's preface to his edition of Camden's Annals ; the third, in a letter from Sir Henry Sidney, at that time Lord Deputy, to Sir Francis Walsingham, in the Sidney Papers. The first and second of these may be reasonably suspected of opposite partiality. The object of the first was to load Leicester's memory with every possible imputation : that of the other, to screen Sidney, indeed, married to Leicester's sister, and it detracts nothing from his most honourable character, that he should have laboured to avert from his brother-in-law so horrible a charge. Waterhouse's very curious narrative (if it was his) is given with great candour. His opinion however of the writer may be inferred from the words with which it commences : "Walter, the noble Earl of Essex, Earl Marshal of Ireland, Knight of the most honourable Order of the Garter, falling sick with a sickness, as was supposed, called Dysentaria, through aduotion of choler, on Friday the twenty-first of August (or whether it was of some other accident, I living knoweth, and I revenge it), he grievously laboured by the space of twenty-two days," &c. His account is correct, of which there seems no room to doubt, the date on the eleventh or twelfth

■ September, ■■■■; Dugdale, however, citing good authority, fixes his death to the twenty-second of that month. ■■■■ was buried ■■ Caermarthen, the place of his nativity.

Walter, Earl of Essex, married Lettice, daughter to Sir Francis Knollys, K. G., and left issue by her two sons; Robert, his successor, the accomplished, imprudent, and unfortunate favourite ■■ Elizabeth; and Walter; ■■■■ ■■■■ daughters: Penelope, first married to Robert, Lord Rich, afterwards to Charles Blount, Earl of Devonshire; and Dorothy, wife, first, of Sir ■■■■ Perrot; secondly, ■■ Henry Percy, ■■■■ ■■ Northumberland. Some considerable time following the ■■■■ ■■■■ had elapsed when it was suddenly discovered, to the astonishment and disgust of the nation, and in confirmation of former suspicions, that Leicester had privately married the widowed Countess almost immediately after the decease of her ill-fated consort.

SIR NICHOLAS BACON.

FULLER, Lloyd, and other professed dealers in [redacted] characters, have given this gentleman credit for the most exalted talents and acquirements. Careless as such writers are of fact, it would be too much to ascribe these encomiums merely to imagination, but certainly [redacted] history of the memorable period during a great part of which he held one of the [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] over with very little notice, and even the meagre intelligence which it affords us of him [redacted] frequently confused by misrepresentation [redacted] inconsistency. It may be gathered however that he was mild, prudent, and unambitious; qualities which should bespeak rather an honest than a splendid fame; that [redacted] sought rather to be a useful minister than a refined politician; that he loved retirement, and rural occupations, and possessed the temper and [redacted] faculties which make [redacted] agreeable [redacted] themselves and to others in the intercourse of private life; and that the maxim which [redacted] chose for [redacted] motto probably denoted the character of his mind, as well as regulated his conduct—"Mediocria Firma."

He was the second son of Robert Bacon, of Drinkston, in Suffolk, a descendant from a family of respectable antiquity in that county, by Isabella, daughter of John Gage, of Pakenham, also in Suffolk, and was born at Chislehurst, in Kent, in the year 1610. [redacted] his education we know only that [redacted] was completed at Bennet College in Cambridge, or rather at Paris, whither [redacted] went for some time [redacted] leaving [redacted] university: on [redacted] return he studied the law in Gray's Inn, and [redacted]

said to have been distinguished at an early age, as well for his extensive knowledge of it as for his eloquence at the bar. We have no account of the circumstances which introduced him to public employment, but there can be little doubt that ■■■ one among the many subordinate agents in ■■■ Reformation. ■■■ had been bred in the new mode of faith, and professed it through his life with a warmth of zeal scarcely consistent with the placidity of his character. ■■■ first favours too which he received from the Crown were derived from that great fund on which Henry usually charged the rewards of such persons, for they consisted in a grant of the manors of Botesdale and Gillingham, and the manor and park of Redgrave, portions of the estate of the monastery of Bury St. Edmund's. These were conferred on him in 1544, and he was about the same time appointed Solicitor to the Court of Augmentation, and two years after Attorney to the Court of Wards. We have no further intelligence of him during that reign, except that ■■■ formed, and presented to the King, a plan for the foundation of a great college, which ■■■ designed to embrace all subjects of modern learning, and to be devoted, as it should seem, to the education of those designed for the service of the state. Its main objects were, to cultivate the utmost purity in the knowledge of ■■■ Latin and French tongues; to read and debate in ■■■ languages on all subjects of public policy; and ■■■ form historical collections and treatises regarding general systems of government, and their several practical features of domestic management and foreign negotiation; and the students ■■■ length to be perfected in these arts by travelling in the suites of ■■■ King's foreign ministers. It is almost needless to ■■■ the scheme ■■■ never put into execution.

He passed the reign of Edward the Sixth without further promotion, and that of Mary without persecution. Elizabeth, in her first year, 1558, gave ■■■ the custody of the Great Seal, with the style of Lord Keeper, by a patent dated on the twenty-second of December, ■■■ soon after knighted him, and admitted him of her Privy Council. ■ ■ highly probable, not to disparage his professional merits, that he owed ■ ■ and splendid advancement in a great ■ ■ friendship ■ Cecil, with whom he lived in much intimacy and confidence, and whose wife's ■ he had married; and that it ■ through the ■ influence ■ ■ Queen, ■ ■ length ■ Parliament, ■ ■ induced to invest ■ office, for the first time, with ■ the authorities and privileges ■ ■ Chancellorship, ■ ■ of ■ predecessors in the place of Lord Keeper having extended little further than to the mere sealing of patents. He gained, and very deservedly, much credit by ■ judicious treatment, in ■ ■ both's first Parliament, of the great question of her legitimacy, and it was under ■ auspices that two bills were passed, the ■ for recognising her title to the crown, the other for restoring her in blood ■ heir to her mother, silently leaving untouched the act by which her father ■ bastardised her. On this policy Fuller, to give him ■ due, says well—"He was condemned by some who seemed wise, and commended by those who were so, for not causing that statute to be repealed whereby the Queen was made illegitimate, for this wise statesman would not open that wound which time had partly closed, and would not meddle with the variety, yea contrariety, of statutes in ■ kind, whereby people would rather be perplexed than satisfied, but derived her right ■ ■ another statute, which allowed her succession, the rather because lawyers maintain that a crown once worn cleareth all defects of the wearer thereof,"—a doctrine too desperate to be resorted to but in extreme cases, and Elizabeth's was then ■ that description.

■ was appointed in the beginning of the following year to preside at the conference held before the two Houses of Parliament between ■ leading clergy of the two churches on their main points of difference, an office for which he was very unfit, being, as Camden in speaking of it observes, "a very indifferent divine, and a professed enemy to the Papists." This debate, which was instituted with no other motive than to impress on the minds of [redacted] subjects of both persuasions a notion of her impartiality and candour, [redacted] of course abortive. The Protestants entered on it with [redacted] haughtiness of anticipated triumph, [redacted] the [redacted] refused to engage [redacted] any discussion to which the Pope's supremacy was not made a preliminary. They desired [redacted] retire, and Bacon, after repeatedly urging them [redacted] vain to go on, dismissed them with this indirect threat—"For that ye will not that we should hear you, perhaps you may shortly [redacted] of us." [redacted] of them were accordingly committed soon after to the Tower, and the rest were bound to appear before the Privy Council, and to remain within the limits of London and Westminster.

His steady aversion to popery, joined to the legal acuteness and uprightness with which he administered the affairs of his court, and the regular method which he introduced into the deliberations of the Privy Council, placed him high in Elizabeth's favour. "She relied on him," [redacted] Camden, "as the very oracle of the law." [redacted] avoided as much as possible any [redacted] in political intrigues, but the family connexion lately mentioned, as well as his own inclination and judgment, led him to act with what was called the Cecilian party; and this bias, joined to a bitter dislike to the Queen of Scots, chiefly on [redacted] score of her religion, induced him to oppose with imprudent openness not only the proposal for a marriage between that Princess and the favourite Leicester, but also the arguments for her succession to the throne, both of which Elizabeth seemed for the time inclined to countenance. Leicester became hereupon his implacable enemy, and accused him to the Queen of having been concerned, as indeed he probably was, in the composition of a tract, published in 1564, under the name of John Hales, Clerk of the Hanaper. [redacted] of "A [redacted] of the Succession of [redacted] Crown Imperial [redacted] England," [redacted] which [redacted] right [redacted] asserted to be in the issue of the Earl of Hertford by the Lady

Grey, a doctrine peculiarly odious. Hales was committed to the Fleet prison, and then to the Tower, and was forbidden the Court, deprived of seat in the Privy Council, and restricted from any concern in public beyond those of Court of Chancery, from which also Leicester used his utmost efforts to persuade Queen to him. remained for many months in disgrace, and wrote during that interval a sort of recantation, which will presently particularly mentioned, which asserted the right of succession in the line Stuart, still however stoutly insisting on the exclusion of Mary. At the earnest intercession, as our historians say, Cecil, he was at length restored to the exercise of his former functions, and to the Queen's favour, which for the remainder of his life enjoyed interruption.

His true motive to Elizabeth's esteem for him may be ascribed to his inveteracy against Mary; and that his temporary suspension, and her seeming anger, were mere artifices to the vexation of Leicester, and to silence the importunities of the Scottish ambassador, Bishop of Ross, who loudly justice against the authors and patrons of the tract in question. He was placed at the head of the second commission appointed, in 1568, to hear Murray's charges against Queen of Scots; and the meeting in 1571 of ministers and Mary's delegates, at which was demanded, the price of Mary's liberty, that some of the chief nobility, principal fortresses of Scotland, should be placed in hands, his house, where, the objecting to these proposals, broke up the conference, exclaiming, says Camden, "All Scotland, your Prince, nobles, and castles, are too little to secure the Queen, and the flourishing kingdom of England." is scarcely necessary to observe mode of dealing was exactly Elizabeth's taste. In following year the Papists endeavoured avenge Mary's cause, and own, by the publication in unweldie bodie, is the only cause of this; and yet the bodie, ~~as~~ as it ~~is~~ (as allegiance and a number ~~of~~ binds) every day, yea ~~every~~ every howere, ~~it~~ ~~shall~~ shalbe readie, ~~as~~ yo' Highnes' commaundment, and so ~~they~~ they be, if I had as good as any man hathes," &c.

He endowed ~~the~~ college ~~with~~ six scholarships, ~~and~~ more than a ~~hundred~~ manuscripts to its library. Only two publications appear to be extant from his pen; the one entitled, "Arguments ~~presented~~ in Parliament, whereby ~~it~~ is proved that the persons of Noblemen ~~are~~ attachable by Law for Contempts committed ~~in~~ the High ~~Court~~ of Chancery," 4to, 1641; and the other, on a subject which has been already here spoken of—"The Right of Succession to the Crown of England in the Family of the Stuarts, exclusive of Mary Queen of Scots, asserted and defended against ~~the~~ Anthony Browne." This latter tract, which did not appear till 1723, professes to have been published from the original manuscript by Nathaniel Booth, of Gray's Inn, Esq.

~~He~~ died on ~~the~~ twentieth of February, 1579. Mallet, in his life of the great Bacon, tells us, without stating his authority, that Sir Nicholas being "under the hands of his barber, and ~~the~~ weather very sultry, had ordered a window before him to be thrown open. As he was become very corpulent, he presently fell asleep in the current of fresh air that was blowing in ~~on~~ him, and awaked after some time, distempered ~~and~~ ~~then~~ 'Why,' said he to the servant, 'did you leave ~~me~~ ~~thus~~ exposed?' The fellow replied that ~~he~~ durst not presume to disturb him. 'Then,' said the Lord Keeper, 'by your civility I lose my life;' and so removed into ~~his~~ bedchamber, where he ~~remained~~ a few days after." ~~He~~ was buried in ~~St.~~ Paul's Cathedral, under a superb ~~monument~~ monument, erected by himself, inscribed with ~~the~~ following ~~inscription~~ by the hand of George Buchanan—

Hic Nicolaum ne Baconum conditum,
Existima illum, tam diu Britannici
Regni secundum columnam, eritum walls,

*Bonæ æulæ; omnia quæ non extalit
 Ad hunc honorem sem, sed æquitas, fides, Doctrina, pietas, unica et prudentia.
 Non morte raptum crede, quia unica brevi
 Vita perennas emendat dñas : agit
 Vitam secundam cælitus inter animas ;
 Fama implet orbem vita quæ illi tercia est.
 Hac positum in ara est corpus olim solui dæmon,
 Ara dicata sempiternæ memoria."*

He married, first, Jane, daughter of Fernelly, of West Creting, in Suffolk, by whom he had three Nicholas, who was the first Baronet created on the creation of that order ; Nathaniel, of Stiffkey, in Norfolk ; and Edward, of Shrubland Hall, in Suffolk ; and three daughters : Anne, wife of Henry Wodehouse, of Waxham, in Norfolk ; Jane, married first to Sir Francis Wyndham, a judge of the Common Pleas, secondly, to Sir Robert Mansfield ; and Elizabeth, who married, first to Robert D'Oyley, of Chislehampton, in Oxfordshire ; secondly, Sir Henry Nevil ; thirdly, to Sir William Periam, a the Exchequer. Sir Nicholas married, secondly, Anne, daughter and coheir of Sir Anthony Cooke, of Gidea Hall, in Essex, and sister of Lady Burghley, by whom he had two sons ; Anthony ; and Francis, the chancellor, the philosopher, and the great honour and disgrace to his name and family.

THOMAS GRESHAM.

It has been reported that this great Patriarch of commerce, and of commercial finance, issued from the lowest origin, nay even that he was a foundling. An old woman, by this tradition, who was led by the chirping of grasshoppers to the spot where he was exposed, carried him to her cottage, and nursed him, and therefore he chose a grasshopper for his crest. It is inconceivable how such silly falsehoods can gain currency in the mouths of men of extensive notoriety. He descended from a family of respectable antiquity and possessions in Norfolk, which derived its name from that of the parish in which it had originally been seated. His father, Sir Richard, and his uncle, Sir John, who were the third and fourth sons of his grandfather, John Gresham of Holt, in that county, were bred to trade; acquired great wealth; and two of them served the offices of Alderman and Lord Mayor. He was the third and youngest son of Sir Richard Gresham, by his first wife, Audrey, daughter of William Lynn, of Southwick, in Northamptonshire, and was born in the year 1519.

His father for many years exercised the employment in which he himself became afterwards so conspicuous, that of agent for the Crown with the trading interest, or as it was called, King's Merchant, an office of the highest importance and trust, inasmuch as it united the duty of raising money for the royal occasions by private loans, with that of protecting and cherishing the sources from which they were derived. In this, as well as in his own great commercial concerns, it is pretty evident that he designed his son Thomas for his successor, especially as he was regularly bound an apprentice to his uncle Sir John, and afterwards entered into the Mercers' Company; yet he was bred a scholar, and acquired no small fame in the University of Oxford, as Dr. Caius, in his Annals of Gonville and Caius College, says of him, "Una nobiscum per juventutem hujus Collegii pensionarius erat Thomas Gresham, nobilis ille et doctissimus mercator, qui forum mercatorium Londini extruxit," &c. On the death of his father however, which occurred in 1548, Edward the Sixth's Council appointed a Sir William Dansell to the office of royal money agent, who took up his residence in that character at Antwerp, where the trade and wealth of our part of Europe was at that time in a manner monopolised, and from whence the supplies which the profuseness of the preceding reign had rendered so needful had been from time to time drawn, under circumstances of disadvantage to the Crown, which resulted rather from an imperfect knowledge of a right economy in the negotiation of loans than from any inclination to fraud or carelessness. Dansell continued there for a short time, with so little benefit to the King's affairs that it was found necessary to send him letters of recal, which he disobeyed, and Gresham, who, with other merchants, had been called before the Privy Council to advise on the best means of discharging the King's debts, and of procuring future supplies, was sent to Antwerp to supersede him, and presently acquired the highest credit, both there and at home, by his activity, prudence, and fidelity, which distinguished his performance of the duties of his office.

On the accession of Mary, probably on the score of religion, for he had been a zealous Protestant, he was dismissed from this employment. Conscious however that his abilities to execute were unrivalled, and that the fruition of his projects should be delayed by the mismanagement of ignorant competitors, he ventured instantly to present to the Queen a memorial, stating, with a boldness expression very unusual at that time, his services to her brother, and conceived with great force and dexterity, while it concluded without any request, it left her scarcely any liberty to do otherwise in any prudence than to reinstate him. This curious piece, which is of great length, has fortunately been preserved, and it would be difficult to give a clearer idea of the nature of his services, or of the manner in which he performed them, than by citing some passages from it in his own words. Having stated diffusely the circumstances which, as has been here already observed, attended his appointment by King Edward, whose manner in this way of private contract he says amounted at that time to two hundred and sixty thousand pounds, he proceeds thus :—

“ Before I was called to this there was no other way devised to bring the King out of debt but to transport the treasure out of the realm, or else by way of exchange, to the great abasing of the exchange, for a pound of our current money then brought in value but sixteen shillings Flemish ; and for lack of payment there at the days appointed, to prejudice his Majesty's credit with all, to prolong time also upon interest, which interest, besides the loss of the exchange, amounteth unto forty thousand pounds by year ; and in every such prolongation his Majesty was enforced to take great part in jewels or wares, to his extreme loss and damage ; of which forty thousand pounds loss for interest yearly I have by my travail clearly discharged the King every penny, without which prevention the Queen's Majesty had been indebted at her entry into the imperial Crown the sum of four hundred thousand pounds ; besides the saving of the treasure within the realm ; without taking of jewels or wares, to the King's disadvantage. Whereas at the time of my entry into this office I found the exchange at sixteen shillings the pound, I found no means nevertheless, without any charge to the King, or hindrance of any other, to discharge the King's whole debts as they grew due, at twenty shillings, and two and twenty shillings the pound ; whereby the King's Majesty, and

Now the Queen, hath saved one hundred marks clear. By reason that I raised the exchange from sixteen shillings unto two and twenty shillings, whereunto it yet remaineth, the foreign commodities be fallen, and sold after the same value, to the enriching of the subjects of the realm, in small process of time, above four hundred thousand pounds. It is assuredly known that when I took this service in hand the King's Majesty's credit on the other side was small; and yet afore his death he was in such credit, both with strangers and his own merchants, that he might have had any sum of money desired, whereby his enemies began to fear him, for his commodities of the realm, and power amongst Princes, not known before; which credit the Queen's Highness hath obtained, if she in necessity for money at this present day. To the intent to work this matter secretly for the raising of the exchange I did only use all my credit with my substance and friends. To the intent to prevent the merchants, both strangers and English, who always lay in wait to prevent my devices when the exchange fell to raise it again, I bare some one time loss of my own monies, the King's Majesty and his Council well knew, two or three hundred pounds, and this divers times done; besides the credit of fifty thousand pounds which I took by exchange in my own name, without using the King's name. For the accomplishment of the premises I not only left the realm, with my wife and family, my occupying and whole trade of living, by the space of two years, but also posted in that time forty times, upon the King's sending, at the least, from Antwerp to the Court; besides the practising to bring these matters to effect; the infinite occasion of writing also to the King and Council; with the keeping of reckonings and accounts only by my own hand writing, for mistrust in so dangerous a business of preventers, whereof were store too many; until I had clearly discharged all the foresaid debt, to the great benefit of the realm, and profit of the Queen; for in case this debt had been let alone, and deferred upon four or five, her Majesty should it fifteen hundred thousand pounds least, which, God be praised, is ended, and therefore careless day."

Having thus recited his services, he demands an audience of the Queen; for, says he, "nevertheless hitherto do I perceive those which served before me, which brought the King in debt, and took wares jewels up to the King's great loss, are esteemed and preferred for their evil service, contrarywise, myself discountenanced out of my diligence and good service taken to bring the King and Queen's Highness out of debt clear, which understanding of my service that her Majesty may take in good part is as much as I required." Edward had not been ungrateful to him. "It pleased the King's Majesty," adds he, "to give unto me hundred pounds, to me and my heirs for ever, three weeks before his death, and promised me then with his own mouth that he would hereafter rewarded better, saying, 'I should know that I served a King.'" Why he chose to mention this trifling gift, and to be silent as to the valuable grants of a monastic estate in the county of Caermarthen, and of the reversion of the Priory of Westacre in Norfolk, both which he received in that reign, it is not easy to conceive. memorial, aided probably by interest, successful: Mary restored him to his post, which filled during the whole of her reign; and Elizabeth continued him in it, with increased favour, and bestowed honour of knighthood him soon after her accession.

Numerous details of his negotiations remain in our public collections, and in the cabinets of the curious, but the ordinary transactions of a mercantile agent, however enlarged, possess little recommend them to general attention. He became enormously wealthy when he had scarcely passed prime of life. had married early, and his wife brought him only son, whom he the great misfortune to lose, the age of sixteen, in 1564. The enthusiasm which in minds above the common character attends acute grief, produces some extraordinary consequences. Gresham, immediately after the death of his son, determined on the execution of a grand design, which is said to have been conceived by his father, to erect at his own expense a public edifice, after the manner of the great commercial cities of the continent, for the meeting of the merchants of London, who had been used to transact their business, exposed to the weather, in Lombard Street, or, indecently, in Saint Paul's Cathedral. For the purpose of this splendid purpose the corporation purchased and removed eighty houses, which then stood on the site of the projected building, and gave him regular possession of the ground, and towards the end of the year 1567 the Royal Exchange, or, as it was first called, "Britain's Bourse," was completed and opened for use; a monument almost unparalleled to the generosity of a private individual. It was destroyed in the great fire of 1666, but a very correct judgment of its magnificence, and of the great charge of its erection, may be formed from the fact that the building, by which the city, and the company of mercers, immediately replaced it, with very little deviation from the original plan, cost about eighty thousand pounds. Nor was he inattentive to those ostentations which, by no means unbecoming in one who stood confessedly at the head of the important company which he belonged. He had already built, for his own residence, in Bishopsgate Street, a noble mansion, of which it will be necessary presently to speak further, and soon after added to the great purchases, that he had made in many other parts of the kingdom, that beautiful and well-known estate near London, Osterley Park, which he planted and inclosed, and erected in it another spacious stately house. In each of these residences he was more than once the honour of entertaining Elizabeth and her court; and it was in one of her visits to Osterley, that, the Queen having observed that the quadrangle within the building was large, he instantly to London for workmen, who,

with equal expedition and secrecy, divided it in the course of the night by building a wall, which when she was astonished to find completed, in strict conformity to her criticism—a refined gallantry exactly to her taste.

Gresham indeed seems to have possessed much of the refinement of a courtier, and more of the sagacity of a politician. His frequent journeys in the Low Countries he made acute observations on the Spanish policy, and he gained much important intelligence. Elizabeth's ministers, particularly Cecil, courted his advice on many matters, and gave him no share of their confidence. Thus in 1568, during a great scarcity of coin in England, a large Biscayan ship, which was conveying a great quantity in gold and silver to the Duke of Alva for the payment of his troops, having been chased into the harbour of Plymouth, Gresham, who had received intelligence that the money was not the property of the King of Spain, but had been wrested by him from certain merchants of Genoa, apprised Cecil of that fact, and persuaded him to seize it, and send it to the mint, giving security however to the Spanish ambassador to repay the amount when he should be made to appear to whom of right it belonged. Cecil reluctantly complied, and advised Elizabeth accordingly; the Duke of Alva, enraged and disappointed, caused all the English at Antwerp to be arrested, an outrage which was immediately retaliated on the Spaniards then in London. Cecil, who abhorred violent measures, became alarmed, and was with some difficulty appeased by Gresham's suggestion that any future foreign loans which the Crown might be as advantageously negotiated at Hamburgh as at Antwerp, but he might reasonably expected that the refusal of our own merchants to make advances would render them unnecessary. An original letter of great curiosity from Gresham to Cecil, in which these points are touched on, is in the Lansdowne collection, in the British Museum. Stowe, who had by some means obtained a perusal of it, has given large extracts from it, almost verbatim, in his Survey of London; and the authors of the Biographia Britannica, quoting Stowe, represent them, from what motive ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ easy to guess, as arguments used by Gresham in a personal conference with the Minister. The letter has a peculiar claim to be inserted in this memoir in its full integrity.

"Right honorable S.

This morning I have receaved y^e. with my l^res, by my s^rvaunt, wherbie I do perceyve that the monneye whiche remanith in my hands of S^r. Will^m Garrard, and the armor, must be paid to the m^rchauntes, wherin I shal p^rcede with paiement of their som^es until furder yo^r. pless^r. be knownen, for the whiche maie please you to Q['] Ma^y. warraunt. And, wherreas yo^r. difficulte paie any monney Q['] Ma^y. creditors beyond S^r., in my opinion youe neede not to make any dowbt therof yf her Highnes see her m^rchaunts well paid here London this [redacted] for bie that tyme the other monney shalbe payable hear bie the Q['] Ma^y. to her said m^rchaunts they shall have both plenty of monney at Hamboroughe and heare; assuring you the goodes o^r. m^rchaunta hathe shipped from Hambrough hither well worth c^{ost}. and better; and the shipping they make from hena wth o^r. comodityes is richely worthe v^{al}ue, and better, for that ther wilbe above xxx^{li}. clothes, the wherof wilbe worth to the Q['] Ma^y. the least x^{li}., which will discharg that debt, if it stand so wth. the Q['] Ma^y. pleas^r.

S^r, I do perceyve that ■■■ gretest care that youe have is ■■■ o^r. m^rchaunts shall not have monney inoughs for ■ by up o^r. comodyttes, wherin you need not dowbt, coⁿsidering the goode vent they have ■■ at Hamboroughe alredie, and are like to have; therefore I shall most humblie beseeche you, for the ■■ and advancing of the Q.^s Ma^{ty}. credit, ■■ small payment ■■ ■ agreed upon alredy ■ Hamborough maie be paid, considering that I have written heretofore to ■■■ creditors they shuld have a payment made there now

this August, whiche paiment will not a litle aduance her Highnes' honnor and credit; how much her Highnes credit hath stand her in steede beyond the seas for reddie monney it is to tedious, and so long a matter, to trouble you wth. all; but if my credit were such that I were able to performe the Q.' Ma^{ty} and you, I have that matter sorrowid for above all other things; assuring you, S^r., I do know for certain that the Duke de Alva is more troubled wth. the Q.' Ma^{ty}.s gret credit, and wth. the vent of her Highnes' commodities at Hamborough, then he is wth. any thing els, he quakes for feare, which is one of the chiefest things that is the let that the said Duke cannot com by the tenth penny that he now demandeth for the sale of all goods anny kind of waye in the Lowe Countrey, wth., S^r., I beleve wilbe his utter undoing. Therefore, S^r., to conclude, I would wishe that the Q.' Ma^{ty}. at this tyme shuld not have any straungers, but her own subjects, wherlie, she, and all other Princes, maie see what a Prince of power she is; and bise this meanes there is no doubt but that her Highnes shall com the Duke of Alva to know himself, and to make what end with that Lowe Countreys her Ma^{ty}. will herself, what brute soev^r. here spreadde abroad to the contrary.

"S^r., seeing I am entrid so farre wth youe for the credit of the Q.' Ma^{ty}. beyond the seas, wherin I have travailed this yeres, and bise experience in using o^r. m^r.chaunts found gret honnor to the Prince, as also gret p^rfit to the m^r.chaunts, and in the whole realm, whatsoever our m^r.chaunts saye to the coⁿtrarye; for when o^r. Prince ought to have m^r.chaunts LX as m^r.chaunts then they knew themselves, and dailie reddie to s^rve as good chepe as straungers did, whiche, S^r., I wold wishe again in this time of extremity to be usid, for that I knowe o^r. m^r.chaunts be able to do yt, because the debt is divided into many mennes hands, and by no means cannot hinder having intrest. Other I have to molest you wth.all, that as of this present M^r. Benedik Spinola brought home to my house

SIR THOMAS GRESHAM.

m^r.chaunt of Janua, calid [redacted] Ragio, to [redacted] leave [redacted] me, to knowe if he could pleasure me wth. any thing in Flaunders; and, as I thanked him, so, emongs other communication of p^rfit, and for s^r.vice by his ministrie, he [redacted] me to be his frend for such monney as the Q.^e Ma^{ty}. hath of his in the Towr. With that I asked him what his somme was, and [redacted] sayed xx or xxx^l. ducats: but by [redacted] I p^roeive he hathe much [redacted] other of his frinds. Now, S^r., seeing this monney in the Towr dothe app^rtain [redacted] m^r.chaunts, I wold wishe the Q.^e Ma^{ty}. to putt [redacted] to the use [redacted] some p^rfit; [redacted] to mynt it into her [redacted] coyne, wherbye [redacted] be a gaynor in or m^ouⁿty, and enriche her relm wth. so much fyne silv^r.: and for the re-payment thereof her Highnes [redacted] paie it his the waie of exchange, or otherwise, to her gret fardell and profit; [redacted] also her Ma^{ty}. maie take it up of the said m^r.chaunts upon intrest, appon the bands accustomed, for yere [redacted] twoo, whiche I [redacted] they wilbe right glad of; and so wth. the said monney her Ma^{ty}. maie paie her debts both heare and in Flaunders, to the gret bonnor and credit of her Ma^{ty}. throughout all Xtendom; [redacted] knowith the L. who pres^rve you, with the increse of honnor. From Gresham House, the 14 of August, 1569,

At yo^r. Honor's commandment,

THOMAS GRESHAM.

"S^r. I most humbly thancke you for the remembrans that yow have of my sewle for my Lady Mary Grey, and for my lande [redacted] Oysterley."

Cecil, convinced and encouraged by these arguments, laid them before the Queen, who determined to take the steps recommended by them, and Gresham, to forward the more effectually [redacted] advice by [redacted] own example, sent, in the succeeding month, to the Tower five sacks of new Spanish reals, each [redacted] weighing nearly one thousand pounds, [redacted] be coined for [redacted] Queen's use, [redacted] own individual contribution; but he had calculated erroneously on the disposition of the London merchants to lend. ■ proposed ■ matter ■ them, ■ they, to shift from themselves the odium of ■ direct refusal, referred ■ ■ ■ public question ■ the assembly ■ ■ ■ hall, by which, even then distinguished by ■ vulgar ■ senseless inclination to oppose indiscriminately all ■ ■ ■ instituted by the ministers of the Crown, it was negatived. Graham treated these persons with the disdain which they merited. Abandoning his original intention ■ negotiating ■ loan with privacy, he procured ■ letter ■ the Privy Council ■ the great company of Merchant Adventurers, which may be found ■ length in Stowe's Survey, remonstrating with them in plain ■ ■ the subterfuge which ■ ■ ■ been thus used by many of their members in ■ ■ individual capacity, and reproaching them with ingratitude to ■ Crown, which had constantly and carefully forwarded their best interests. The Merchant Adventurers, ashamed not less of the inferior people ■ ■ whom ■ ■ of them had thus associated themselves, than of the narrow views with which they had formed that connection, readily agreed to furnish the ■ ■ required, and lent Elizabeth sixteen thousand pounds on her bonds, at the then moderate interest of six per cent. She, ■ her part, testified her gratitude ■ them, and to Graham, by honouring him, ■ the twenty-third ■ January, 1570, with ■ visit ■ ■ house in Bishopsgate Street, where she dined, and, ■ returning in the evening by Cornhill, entered the Bursc, with ■ ■ than ordinary ■ ■ and caused ■ ■ ■ ■ proclaim ■ ■ it should thenceforth be called by ■ ■ ■ of "the Royal Exchange."

In the ■ ■ of 1572 ■ Queen, resolving ■ make a ■ ■ longer ■ ■ ordinary, thought fit, from some motive of jealousy of her good citizens of London, ■ ■ forgotten, to issue ■ commission rather of an unusual nature, by which the Archbishop ■ Canterbury, and eight other distinguished persons, ■ ■ authorized and commanded to ■ ■ the Lord Mayor with their counsel for the good government and peace of ■ city during the absence of herself ■ her Court and

Thomas was of the number ; measure was thought to have produced such good effects, that it was always resorted to on similar occasions during that reign ; and his name was constantly inserted. It is probable, indeed, considering the importance of his connexion once with the Court and the city, that the exercise of this office fell chiefly on him. In the following year, through his exertions, the Queen's bonds to the London were punctually discharged ; proof of good faith so fixed his credit, that his future negotiations for similar loans were always managed without distrust or cuncty. In 1576 he was joined in a commission Burghley, Walsingham and Martin, master of the Mint, to inquire into the nature of foreign exchanges, and with this appointment his public employment seems to have ended.

He had for some years meditated the foundation of a distinguished place of education for the of of London, but seems to have been undetermined where to establish it. Each of the Universities addressed him on this subject, soliciting the preference with that pertinacious importunity generally used by corporate societies ; and Gresham, who really seems to have previously hesitated between Oxford and Cambridge, was perhaps induced by this indecorum to fix on London. He resolved to convert his ample dwelling in Bishopsgate Street into a college : to endow it with revenues arising from the profits of the Royal Exchange, and to place it under the care of the same trustees to whom he had already committed the charge of his superb property. By a deed of the twenty-fourth of May, 1575, and by his last will, dated the fifth of the following July, he vested the edifice in the corporation of London and the company of mercers, to be equally enjoyed by them ; the City to pay out of its moiety an annual salary of fifty pounds each to four professors of divinity, astronomy, music, and geometry ; the mercers to pay the same stipend to three in law, physic, and rhetoric. These professors to reside, and to read their lectures, in his mansion, afterwards called Gresham College, ■■■ he annexed eight almshouses, to be maintained from the same source, which he charged also with liberal pensions ■■■ several hospitals and prisons. This laudable and generous institution flourished usefully ■■■ the end of the succeeding century, when, ■■■ Revolution having totally broken down the fences which even till then had kept the different classes of society in some degree distinct from each other, the citizens became too haughty to accept of gratuitous instruction : Gresham College dwindled gradually till the year 1768, when ■■■ act ■■■ ■■■ passed for the purchase of it by the commissioners of ■■■ Excise : it ■■■ pulled down : and the present Excise office was erected ■■■ its site. ■■■ room, over part of the Exchange, ■■■ appointed for the lectures, which have long been in a great ■■■■ discontinued. As the salaries remain, the professorships still exist. ■■■ the rest is nearly extinct.

■■■ Thomas Gresham died ■■■ apoplexy ■■■ the twenty-first of November, 1579, and was buried in the parish church ■■■ St. Helen, in Bishopsgate Street. By his wife, Anne, daughter ■■■ William Ferneley, of West Creting, in Norfolk, and relict of William Read of Fulham, in Middlesex, a merchant of London, he had, ■■■ has been observed, an only son, Richard, who died young. ■■■ left however a natural daughter, ■■■ fruit of an amour with a native of Bruges, whom he gave in marriage, portioned with ■■■■ estates in Norfolk ■■■ Suffolk, ■■■ Nathaniel, second son of ■■■ Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, whose wife was sister to the Lady Gresham.

FITZALAN,

EARL OF

THE first attempt is made to bring into view the dispersed relics of this very eminent person's story. In searching for them, regret has been excited at every step by evident presumptions that innumerable circumstances of that story have been long lost in utter oblivion. In the life of a man of exalted rank, not less distinguished by the vigour of his talents than by his honesty and high spirit; continually in the service of the Crown, under four Monarchs the characters of whose minds and tempers, and the policy of whose governments, dissimilar to opposition; devoted with the most faithful and unbending resolution to a religion which he alternately cherished and proscribed by those Princes, professed and abjured by his compeers; what interesting facts must have occurred! what dangers must he not have encountered, what must he not have surmounted! Those curiosities, however, have been sacrificed to the dulness or the timidity of the historians of the eighteenth century, and little remains of him but an outline which it is now too late to endeavour to fill up.

Henry Fitzalan, the last Earl of Arundel of his family, was born 1512, the only son of William, Earl, by Anne, second daughter of Henry, fourth of Northumberland of the Percys. He had passed the age thirty before he succeeded, on his father's death, to the titles and great estates of his ancestors, and his life had been till then confined, according to rule domestic subordination which generally prevailed in that time, to the sports of the field, ■■■■ festivities and ■■■■ exercises ■ the Court. In ■ summer, however, of ■ following year, 1544, ■ attended Henry in his splendid voyage to Boulogne, and was appointed, on his arrival there, Field Marshal of the army then employed in the remarkable siege of that town, under the command of Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. The success of ■ enterprise ■ at least completed by his vigilance ■ courage. In ■ night of the eleventh of September, after the siege had been carried on for six weeks, he marched the squadron committed to his charge close under the walls, and there awaited the event of a furious discharge of cannon which played on them over his head. It proved fortunate: a breach was effected: and he, at the head of his troops, first entered the town, which two days after capitulated. The King rewarded this service by a grant of the Government of Calais, and of the office of Comptroller of the Royal Household. Henry loved bravery, but he loved yet better implicit obedience, of which he received shortly after from this nobleman a remarkable proof. He had been appointed with others, to negotiate a treaty with the Scots, the terms proposed for which had received the unanimous approbation ■ the Council, but ■ secretly disliked by the King. Henry, unwilling to disoblige his ministers, permitted them to write ■ ■ name to ■ Earl to conclude the treaty, but in the same hour commanded Cecil, whom he had lately received into much confidence, to repair privately ■ the Earl, in Scotland, and to tell him that, whatsoever he, the King, had ordered by his letter, it was his Majesty's pleasure that ■ should immediately break up the treaty. Cecil observing to the King, to use the words of my author, "that a message by word ■ month, being contrary to his letter, would never be believed; 'Well,' said the King, 'do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing of ■ to his own choice.' Upon Mr. ■ arrival, ■ Earl of Arundel showed the other ■ missioners as well the message as the letter: they are all for letter. ■■■ nothing, ■■■ ordered ■■■ message ■■■ be written, and signed by his fellow-commissioners ; and thereupon immediately ■■■ up ■■■ treaty, sending Cecil with ■■■ advertisement of it to the King, who, as soon as he saw him, asked aloud—‘What, will he do it, or no ?’ ■■■ replied, ■■■ Majesty might understand ■■■ by ■■■ inclosed ; but then the King, half angry, urged—‘Nay, ■■■ me, will he do it, or no ?’ Being then told ■■■ was done, he returned to the Lords, and said, ‘Now you will hear news, the fine treaty ■■■ broken ;’ whereunto ■■■ presently answered, ■■■ he who ■■■ broke it deserved to lose his head ; to which the King straightly replied, that he would lose a dozen ■■■ heads as his was that so judged rather than one such servant ■■■ had done it, and therewith commanded ■■■ Earl of Arundel’s pardon should be presently drawn up, the which he sent, with letters of thanks, and ■■■ of favour.” Henry, soon after his return, appointed him Lord Chamberlain, and, in his last moments, which indeed were then approaching, distinguished ■■■ by naming him ■■■ of the guardians of the infant successor.

In the great conflict for power between Seymour and Dudley which agitated the following reign, it was scarcely possible for any eminent person connected with the ■■■ or court to remain neuter. The Earl of Arundel, who ■■■ continued Lord Chamberlain, ■■■ to have endeavoured ■■■ keep that ■■■ for a time, but at length joined the faction of Warwick, and when the first storm broke out against ■■■ Protector, ■■■ appointed, partly from confidence, and in some measure in consideration of his high office in the household, ■■■ ■■■ six Lords under whose care, or rather in whose custody, the King ■■■ placed, to frustrate any attempt by the other party to seize his person. ■■■ not possible, however, that two such men ■■■ remain long united. The grand features of Warwick’s disposition were, an ambition wholly unprincipled, and a violence of temper which broke through all the bounds of prudence ; while Arundel, to use the words of Sir John Hayward, perhaps the only writer of credit who has left us any glimpse of the character of his mind, was "in his nature circumspect and slow," as well as of unimpaired probity. Scarcely three months had passed, when the Earl was suddenly deprived of his post, and of his seat in the Privy Council, and strange accusations, which have been most obscurely recorded, were preferred against him, and some other great men. All that we can learn of his head is, that he was charged with "having taken away the keys of Westminster" (probably meaning the palace, where Edward was imprisoned), and that he "had given away the King's stuff." The tribunal, probably the packed remains of Warwick's Council, affected to take cognizance of these alleged offences, committed him for a time to the Tower, fined him in twelve thousand pounds, to be paid at the rate of one thousand pounds yearly, and afterwards banished him to one of his country seats. "Doubtless," says Hayward in his head, "the Earl of Warwick had good reason to suspect that they who had the honesty not to approve his purpose would not want the heart to oppose against it."

The Earl of Arundel retired accordingly, and lived in privacy till the King's death, soon after which he appeared among the foremost of the supporters of Mary's title to the Crown; yet Jane Grey, under the advice of her father-in-law, Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, who was perhaps willing to magnify her strength by concealing her weakness, charged those to whom she wrote to levy forces for the furtherance of her claim, to make no application to the Duke and Duchess of Arundel, "relying on them otherwise for her service." The Earl, however, appeared presently at the great meeting of Mary's friends at Baynard's Castle, and addressed them with a fervour of eloquence and reasoning which has preserved at least the substance of his speech from oblivion. "In this assembly," says Hayward, "the Earl of Arundel, Duke of Northumberland, and severity. He ran over the history of the times, reckoning every act of mismanagement, cruelty, and injustice, committed in King Edward's reign, threw the odium of all upon him only. Then he made flattering complaints that Henry the Eighth should, contrary all right, be thrust from the succession, he professed himself amazed to how Northumberland brought such great and noble persons, meaning present, to so mean servitude as to be made the tools of his wicked designs; for it was by their consent and assistance that the queen was put upon the daughter of Suffolk, the Northumberland's daughter-in-law, the sovereignty in him remaining in him of exercising the most uncontrollable rage and tyranny over their lives and fortunes. To accomplish his usurpation indeed, the cause of religion he pretended; but, though they had forgot the Apostle's advice, 'not to do evil that good may follow; and to obey even bad Princes, not out of fear, but for conscience' sake;' yet who, he asked, had he to that in the name of religion Queen Mary intended any alteration? for, when she lately addressed about this in Suffolk, she had (which indeed was true) given a very fair, satisfactory answer; and 'what a folly is it,' says he, 'for men to throw themselves into certain destruction, to avoid uncertain danger!' I heartily wish there had been no such transgression; but, since there has, the best remedy for a past error is a timely repentance; wherefore it is my advice that we all join our utmost endeavours, that so, by our authority, Mary, the rightful and undoubted heiress of the kingdoms, may be proclaimed Queen."

The accession of the Princess to the throne without blood may perhaps be reasonably ascribed to this well-timed harangue, and to the vigour and good judgment with which the Earl pursued the course which he had so warmly advised. The assembly, wound up in a pitch of enthusiasm, rose, and instantly accompanied him into the city, where, having obtained the attendance of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they proclaimed Mary with [redacted] applause. [redacted] done, [redacted] took horse the [redacted] evening; rode into Suffolk, where she was then awaiting the issue of the contest, to communicate the tidings, and receive her commands; and, on the following day, personally arrested [redacted] [redacted] of Northumberland [redacted] Cambridge, [redacted] led him, a prisoner, towards the Tower of London. It [redacted] astonishing that such mighty measures should have been proposed and executed in the space of three days; but the whole was actually accomplished [redacted] the nineteenth, twentieth, [redacted] twenty-first of July, 1553.

Mary acknowledged these eminent services [redacted] becoming gratitude; distinguished him during her short reign by the most perfect confidence; and bestowed [redacted] him the offices of President of her Council, and Steward of her household. [redacted] was also elected Chancellor of [redacted] University of Oxford [redacted] [redacted] her accession, a dignity which he of course resigned [redacted] the re-establishment of the Protestant Church by Elizabeth. He [redacted] [redacted] less favoured however by that Princess, who continued him in the post of Lord Steward, [redacted] complimented the high antiquity of his name [redacted] titles with the exalted appointments of High Constable, and High Steward of England, at her coronation. He [redacted] [redacted] among the few of her eminent subjects who [redacted] themselves, and had in [redacted] probability been flattered by her, with the hope of gaining her hand. It should [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] he had explicitly [redacted] himself, and been rejected; for Dugdale, quoting, I believe erroneously, Camden, says, "Having [redacted] himself with hopes of obtaining Queen [redacted] for [redacted] wife, and failing therein, after [redacted] had spent much upon these vain imaginations, his friends in Court failing him, he grew troubled in mind, [redacted] thereupon, to wear off the grief, got leave to travel." [redacted] happened in 1561. How long he [redacted] remained abroad [redacted] not appear, but he [redacted] [redacted] London in December 1565, when [redacted] again obtained a license [redacted] leave England, [redacted] went soon [redacted] into Italy, where [redacted] [redacted] to have sojourned [redacted] four years. [redacted] his long absence from his own country he contracted a great fondness for foreign fashions, several of which, on his return, he introduced here, particularly the use of coaches, the first of which ever seen in England was kept by himself.

He seems to have been entirely disengaged from public business in the year 1569, when he was appointed one of the Commissioners to inquire into the murder of Henry, King of Scotland, of which he avowed his opinion that Mary was innocent. His generous soul loathed the snares with which Elizabeth and her ministers surrounded that unhappy Princess, and, in a debate in the Privy Council on the suggestion of some new artifice against her, he had the boldness to say, in the Queen's presence, that "the wisdom of the former was so provident that it needed not, and was plain that it endured not, such shifts." That which was called Mary's party, however, reckoned on his uniform support, but his sense of loyalty and justice was as pure as his frankness and impartiality, and when Leicester imparted to him the plan secretly formed for a marriage between the Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, whose first lady was Arundel's daughter, he declared that he would oppose it to the utmost, unless it was previously sanctioned by Elizabeth's consent. His intercourse, however, with Mary's friends rendered him an object of suspicion, and in 1572 he suffered a short imprisonment in the Tower, after which he sunk gradually in the mistress's favour, and at length wholly lost it by his determined opposition to her matrimonial treaty with the Duke of Anjou. From that time to his death he remained in retirement. "About the beginning of the year," says Camden, in his annals of Elizabeth, 1580, "Henry Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel, rendered his soul to God, in whom his extinct surname of Fitzalan, a noble family, which flourished with great honour for three hundred years and more, terminated. Richard Fitzalan, who, being the Albeneya, ancient Lord of Arundel and in the reign of Edward First, received the title of Earl, without any creation, in regard of his being possessed of the ~~Barony~~ of Arundel." He married, first, Catherine, daughter of Thomas Grey, second Marquis of Dorset, by whom he had three children, all of whom he outlived; Henry, who was Barons, young, and unmarried; Joan, married to John, Lord Lumley; and Mary, to Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, in right of descent from whose son, Philip, first Earl of Arundel of the Howards, the present Duke of Norfolk, enjoys this remarkable Earldom, under the tenure so clearly stated by Camden in the foregoing passage, which I have inserted for the sake of elucidating a frequently disputed point. His second lady was Mary, daughter of Sir John Arundel, of Lanherne, in Cornwall, who was Robert Radclyffe, Earl of Sussex, by whom he had no issue.

JAMES DOUGLAS,

—

JAMES DOUGLAS, third Earl of Morton, having no issue, obtained, on the twenty-second of April, 1543, a royal charter entailing his Earldom, and the chief of his estates, on the youngest of his three daughters, Elizabeth, and her husband, James, second son of Sir George Douglas, brother to Archibald Earl of Angus, by Elizabeth, daughter and heir of David Douglas, of Pittendreath, their heirs male. In right of that settlement James, on the death of his father-in-law in 1553, succeeded to the dignity. He will be the subject of this memoir.

The enmity of James the Fifth of Scotland to the great House of Angus, and its causes, are well known to all readers of the history of that country. In the year 1529, the Earl of Angus, and his brother, George, were declared guilty of high treason: their great estates were forfeited, and they fled, with their families, to England, where they remained for fourteen years. Under untoward circumstances, the education of James, then a boy, is to have been wholly neglected. He was committed to the care of a trusty person of inferior rank; assumed the name of Innes; and, as he approached to manhood, was engaged to serve in the household of a person of quality in the capacity of steward, or chamberlain. On the King's death, in the year 1542, withdrew him from this seclusion; he returned to Scotland with his relations, having made an advantageous match which has been already mentioned, took on himself, according to the custom of the country, the designation of Master of Morton. His expectations in this period were peculiarly lofty. He was nearly related to royalty, both in his blood and by his marriage, and his capacious and haughty mind, however uncultivated, was amply impressed by the importance of his station.

His entrance into public life seemed to be marked by ill fortune, but chance, or his own dexterity, or both, turned it to his advantage. On the invasion of his country by the English in 1544, he garrisoned, and bravely defended, the castle of Dalkeith, one of the mansions of his family, and probably his place of residence; but, in a similar endeavour in 1547, after the fall of Musselborough, he was compelled to surrender it, and was himself taken by the victorious Earl of Hertford to England, where he remained a prisoner for several years. During that period it has been said that he formed intimacies, and contracted engagements, which length bound him to forward the views of this country in Scotland, and that he was placed on the height to which he afterwards attained rather by the predominant influence of the English crown than by the power of his family, or the extent of his talents. For a considerable time, however, after his return he lived in utter privacy, applying himself to those studies which had been denied to his youth, and to the improvement of his dilapidated estates; and it was not till he emerged from his retirement, when he suddenly stood forward as a patron of the reformers, and enrolled himself among those persons of quality who then took on themselves the style of "Lords of the Congregation." In the following year the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise, expired, and the Parliament, which provisionally assumed the government, dispatched him, together with the Earl of Glencairn, James Lethington, on an embassy to Elizabeth, by whom they were most graciously received; and in this visit to her court Morton's attachment to the English interest was probably confirmed.

On the arrival of Mary from France, in 1561, of her Privy Council; and early in 1563, succeeded George, of Huntley, in the office of Lord High Chancellor. He had gained no small degree of favour from Mary by his approbation of her match with Darnley, though it arose from motives of pride and interest, for Darnley was in relation; on the other hand, his connection with Murray, the leader of the reformers, who had been exiled for his fierce opposition to it, rendered him an object of her suspicion. The influence of Mary regarding him was thus balanced when the assassination of Rizzio in 1566 drew down on him her deadly hatred. That enormity was the result of a regular treaty between the King and Morton, by which the former had agreed to defend the reformed religion, and to procure a pardon for Murray and his associates; and the Earl, on his part, to secure Henry's succession to the sovereign authority in the event of his surviving the Queen, and to contrive and superintend the murder of the unworthy favourites; and this he did, even in person, for he led the armed force which surrounded the palace during the perpetration of it. Rizzio was scarcely dead, when Murray, and the other exiled Lords, recalled, as has been justly observed, at the instance of Morton, arrived at Edinburgh. Mary, anxious to oppose them to the King's faction, received them as friends, and they, in an affectation of gratitude to Morton, besought her to promise him her pardon. She yielded to their request, and even admitted him to her presence, but was secretly inexorable, and on the very same day persuaded the weak and worthless Darnley to abandon the guilty instrument of his vengeance; to fly privately with her to Dunbar; there to collect a military force, for the purpose of wresting the capital from Morton and his party, and sacrificing them to her rage. Murray, tempted by her promises, as readily deserted his benefactor; and Morton, deprived of his great office, and presently after of his estates, once more took refuge in England.

His exile was short. Bothwell, now unhappily the object of Mary's partiality, sought the aid of all parties to the wild design he secretly entertained of sharing with her the Throne. His power, the talents, and the courage of Morton, and perhaps the readiness with which he had so lately undertaken a base and horrible assassination, combined to recommend him; and Bothwell, to whom Mary could then deny nothing, obtained his pardon with little difficulty, communicated to him the dreadful project which had been conceived to destroy the King, and solicited his advice and assistance in the execution of it. Morton hesitated, not from dictates of conscience but of caution, for his answer was that he would not engage in it unless he had an order to secure him under the Queen's sign manual; and, in the same spirit, he took care to be at the distance of twenty miles from Edinburgh when the deed was perpetrated there. It was followed by Mary's infamous marriage to Bothwell, and the consequent association of a considerable number of the most powerful of the Scottish nobility, for the protection of the young Prince, to possess himself of whose person he had left no means untried but those of force. Morton joined them with apparent zeal and alacrity; encouraged them to take up arms; and commanded one of the two battalions into which they divided a force hastily raised for the capture of Bothwell. It is needless to dwell here on events which form one of the most striking epochs in the history of Scotland. Mary, who was with Bothwell at Dunbar, surrounded by her troops, endeavoured to arrest the march of the confederates by proposals of treaty, and offers of pardon; but Morton, whom they had agreed should take the lead, answered that they came not against the Queen, but to demand the murderer of the King: not to seek pardon for their offences, but to grant pardon to such as might appear to deserve it. They advanced; Bothwell, through the connivance of Morton, was suffered to escape; and Mary, submitting to a hard deserved necessity, surrendered her person on conditions which were soon made broken, was the next day led a prisoner by Morton to the castle of Lochleven, and placed in the custody of the owner, William Douglas, in relation.

A resignation of the Crown to her infant son was now extorted from her, and Murray was appointed to the Regency. Morton, who in eminent general capacity united that coolness and subtlety which the fury of the time rendered peculiarly necessary to a minister, became the chief adviser of his measures, the most distinguished object of his favour. On the eleventh of November, 1567, the Regent restored him the great office of Chancellor, and in the following month appointed him, to the forfeiture of Bothwell, hereditary High Admiral of Scotland, and Sheriff of Edinburgh. So universal was the confidence reposed in him by Murray, that, in the spring of the following year, when Mary escaped from Lochleven, and appeared at the head of an army, he was chosen to command the van of the Regent's troops in the battle of Langside, that unfortunate action which fatally compelled her to seek refuge in England. Morton presently followed her thither. He was the Regent's principal coadjutor in the celebrated conference at her instituted by Elizabeth at York, and afterwards removed to Westminster, and maintained throughout the whole of that tedious and solemn deception a correspondence with Cecil, which, while it injured to the last degree the already-disinterested interests of Mary, contributed in no small degree to increase that dependence of Scotland on the will of Elizabeth, which has been usually charged to the condescensions of Murray.

A year had scarcely passed after the close of this negotiation, for so it might be called, when Murray was by the hand of an assassin. Great a powerful party appeared in for the Queen; and Morton, who had for some time placed himself at the head of the government, preferred Elizabeth a welcome suit for her interposition.

King's party, as it was called, prevailed ; and, under her auspices, the Lenox, father Darnley, consequently Mary's implacable enemy, was elected to the Regency. A treaty was established for the restoration of Mary, at least to her liberty, and Morton was placed at the head of the three commissioners named by the Regent. The professions of Elizabeth, at her motion it commenced, seemed at length to be sincere ; but, on the meeting in London of the parties delegated by the three powers, Morton, with a warmth by no means consistent with his character, asserted in high terms the justice of limiting the power of Princes, and the inherent right of the subjects ; Elizabeth, with whom it scarcely be doubted that a proposed discussion of subjects in that age esteemed so monstrous had been previously concerted, manifested the utmost indignation, and broke up the congress. Scotland, in the meantime, distracted by the excesses of the contending factions. A Parliament chosen by the King's party sitting at Stirling ; another, elected by the Queen's, at Edinburgh. On the third of September, 1571, some of Mary's friends, led by the celebrated Kirkcaldy of Grange, made a sudden attack on the former, and seized the persons of the Regent and his principal nobles. Morton, who had lately arrived from England, resisted. He defended his house with obstinate rage till his assailants forced him to surrender by setting fire to the house. The sole important consequence of this furious enterprise was the death of Lenox, who was killed in the tumult by an unknown hand, for the King's party, which was very small, and had owed a momentary success merely to the unexpectedness of the attack, was presently dispersed by the soldiers of the garrison, and the people of the town. The Duke of Mar, Morton, and Argyll, presently appeared as candidates for the Regency, and the former gained the election.

Morton held that high office scarcely for a year. Morton, in whose hands the two preceding Regents had in fact lodged the whole direction of the State, still ruled ■ with unimpaired sway, and the weight of his talents, and the extent of his domains, rendered any endeavour to remove him at once inconvenient and dangerous. In the mean time, he avenged ■ secret vexation which the disappointment of his pretensions to the Regency had excited by thwarting the ■ of ■ successful rival, and opposing ■ his ■ for ■ establishment of public tranquility ■ the artifices of factious intrigue. Mar, ■ man of ■ intellect ■ delicate fibre, fell ■ sacrifice to the contest, and ■ November, 1578, Morton, chiefly through the powerful aid ■ Elizabeth, ■ chosen to succeed him without opposition. Sensible, from the effects of his aversion to peace while he was the second person in the State, how necessary it was to him in his new station, he ■ opened ■ treaty with the Queen's party. It was divided into two factions, the one headed by the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earl of Huntly, ■ other by Maitland and Kirkaldy, the former, of great personal weight, and actuated by motives of cool policy, the latter, distinguished by superior talents and earnest zeal. He determined, while he offered ■ to each, to treat separately with ■ first, and to sacrifice the second to his resentment, and the event amply proved the depth of his policy. ■ and Huntly eagerly accepted his proposals, but ■ and Kirkaldy, who possessed the Castle ■ Edinburgh, enraged ■ his duplicity, commenced open hostilities by firing ■ city. Elizabeth, secretly a party to the plan, ■ a considerable military force to Morton's aid, in direct violation ■ a treaty which she ■ lately concluded with France, and the two gallant chiefs surrendered to her troops, and ■ perfidiously placed by her general in ■ of the Regent, who put Kirkaldy to an ignominious death, while Maitland, to avoid ■ similar fate, destroyed himself ■ his prison. By ■ events, which however ■ civil war in Scotland, the interests of Mary in her own country ■ utterly overthrown.

[REDACTED] nation now expected a benign and prudent [REDACTED] stration, and was disappointed. A fierce and tyrannical spirit, which he had long disguised by deep artifices, began to [REDACTED] itself in Morton. He was discovered to be avaricious and cruel. [REDACTED] the affairs of the [REDACTED] [REDACTED] enriched himself by simoniacal bargains, and impoverished even the inferior clergy by extorting from them portions of their incomes, under the pretence of forming regulations to better their condition. He alienated from him the affections of the commonalty by innumerable fines exacted in the way of composition for real or supposed offences, which they were frequently compelled to confess by torture. The nobility became at length the objects of his oppression and treachery, and in that simple spirit of haughty fierceness which then distinguished them, carried their complaints of him to the King. James had not fully reached his twelfth year, but the period of royal majority was not yet clearly defined, and his mere name was a tower of strength. The Earls of Argyll and Athol, two of the most powerful among the Peers of Scotland, headed the cabal which was formed against the Regent. The King, [REDACTED] their request, signed letters calling a council of such nobles as they proposed to him, which determined that the Chancellor, Lord Glamis, should demand of Morton his resignation of the Regency; and [REDACTED] submitted even [REDACTED] apparent joy, and accompanied them for that purpose [REDACTED] Edinburgh, where James's acceptance of [REDACTED] sovereign authority was immediately proclaimed.

Morton retired to one of his seats, and affected to devote himself to the usual occupations of a rural life. This, however, [REDACTED] but refined dissimulation. He meditated incessantly the means of regaining his public importance; and the violence with which his adversaries pursued their vengeance against him after his retreat aided his views. Their popularity presently declined. The nation saw the King and the Government in the hands of Papists, and Morton was still held as the chief protector of the kirk. The ungenerous persecution of a fallen enemy, as he was deemed, was loudly censured ; he discovered that he was yet master of a powerful party, and resolved to ground his hopes on the issue of one of those bold and irregular enterprises so frequent in the eventful history of this time. James, who was of whose person had been committed to the Earl of Mar, was in the nominal custody of the nobleman's heir, whose youth rendering him unfit to be an important trust, was provisionally by his uncle, Alexander Erskine, Morton's bitter enemy. Morton successfully insinuated to the young Earl and his mother that Alexander formed a design to deprive his nephew of that distinguished honour, as well as of the government of Stirling Castle, in which the King resided ; and Mar, in a transport of fury, aggravated by the suggestions of his ambitious mother, flew to Stirling ; dismissed his uncle ; and made himself master of the King's person, and of the strong garrison by which it was guarded. Morton presently followed him ; took his place in the terrified Privy Council ; and called a Parliament, in the King's name to meet within the castle, which confirmed James's assumption of the government ; ratified a general pardon which had been granted to Morton on his relinquishing the functions of Regent ; and voted a pension to the Countess of Mar, who had in fact been the chief instrument in working this singular change.

Both parties then appeared in arms, and took up arms with considerable strength, but an accommodation was made by the mediation of Elizabeth, to whose will Morton always implicitly submitted. Some of the most eminent of his opponents were introduced into the Privy Council ; a convention of the Nobility was chosen, to which the two factions agreed to refer their differences ; and an apparent reconciliation succeeded ; but it was followed by a horrible circumstance, which, with too great probability, was owing to the vindictive spirit of Morton. To celebrate the accord which had been accomplished, he gave a banquet to the leaders of his enemies, immediately after [redacted] the Earl of Athol, High Chancellor, a [redacted] of eminent abilities, [redacted] his [redacted] opponent, was suddenly taken ill, and died within [redacted] days, with the strongest suspicions of poison: Morton, however, succeeded in turning [redacted] tragical event to his advantage, and purchased the powerful support of Argyll, by bestowing [redacted] the elevated office of his [redacted] principal coadjutor. Having thus [redacted] and weakened the potent band which had been arrayed against him, he poured the full tide of his vengeance [redacted] the great House of Hamilton, [redacted] [redacted] steady adversaries, in a persecution which, as it is rather largely stated in a section of this work to which it more properly appertains, need not be here repeated.

Morton perhaps enjoyed at this time a more extensive power than had distinguished any former period of [redacted] long and eventful administration, yet utter ruin advanced towards him with hasty strides from [redacted] unseen and unexpected quarter. James, now in the fifteenth year of his age, exercised independently many of the functions of a monarch, and more of the faculties of a man. The violent and thoughtless personal attachments which disgraced the whole of his long reign had naturally [redacted] season their fullest scope, and two youthful favourites, of [redacted] blood, [redacted] Stewart, of the House of Lenox, and James Stewart, a younger [redacted] of the Lord Ochiltree, [redacted] whom he conferred the highest dignities and the most splendid appointments, engrossed his affections, and directed his [redacted] duct. [redacted] [redacted] carelessness and confidence which [redacted] their time of life, they shared the kindness of their [redacted] without jealousy; but, in the love of power which belongs [redacted] all [redacted] Morton's authority became odious to them, and they combined [redacted] overthrow it. [redacted] danger was presently evident, and he endeavoured to obviate it by firm and decisive measures. [redacted] denounced Stewart Lenox, who [redacted] in fact a Roman Catholic, to the clergy, as a secret agent from the Pope, and to the State, as an emissary from the Guises; but Lenox made a public abjuration of the Romish faith, and the communion of the Church of Scotland. In the mean time Morton's ancient enemies took advantage of his embarrassment, and spread a report that he was preparing to fly to the King, and to carry him into England. He sought, as usual, the protection of Elizabeth, who instructed him to charge Lenox as a secret enemy to the peace of the two kingdoms, and to require his removal from the Privy Council; but that body, as well as the King, refused with coolness, not to say disdain, to listen to her instances. At the close of this contest, Stewart of Ochiltree, a comparative insignificance to him a secondary object of apprehension, suddenly appeared in the council-chamber where James was then sitting, and falling on his knees, accused Morton, who was present, of being accessory to the murder of the late King.

The general pardon which Morton had received, however particular in its enumeration of causes which might possibly render him liable to prosecution, had left that frightful subject untouched. It was well known that he was privy to the design, and his concealment of it has been already stated. He was arrested, and, as an earnest of the fate he might expect, was committed successively to the custody of two of his most determined enemies—Alexander Erskine, and Lenox, governors of the castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton. Elizabeth interposed between him with a firmness which was of her obligations to his secret agency. She despatched Randolph, one of her ablest diplomatists, to represent in the warmest colours, not only to the King and Council, but to a Convention of the Estates, the merits and services of Morton; to require the fullest and fairest inquiry into the merits of the allegations urged against him; to insist again on the dismissal of Lenox; to offer, should force be necessary to the accomplishment of these objects, any degree of aid, either in arms or money, which might be deemed requisite to that end. To these persuasions she added a silent menace of no small weight, by sending an army to the borders.

■ however, indeed Scotland, remained equally unmoved by her remonstrances or her preparations. Morton was brought to trial on the first of June, 1581, and found guilty of being, to use the language of the Scottish law, art and part in Darnley's murder. The records of the Court of Justiciary, appertaining to that period, are not extant, and historical writers, biassed by party spirit, differ in their reports of the proceedings against him; but thus much is certain, that after his sentence had been passed, he distinctly owned Bothwell's disclosure to him of the intended assassination. On the following day he was led to execution; his enemy, Stewart ■ Ochiltree, commanding in person the soldiers who guarded the scaffold, a shocking instance of the barbarous rudeness of the time. ■ confessed there that it was his design to have sent James into England, but alleged that the resolution was dictated by an opinion that it would ■ proper that the King should in his youth reside at intervals among a people over whom he was one day to reign; ■ that he considered it to be necessary towards securing the succession to the Crown of that country. ■ suffered death with great firmness, and a decent show of piety and resignation. Morton left no issue.

THOMAS RADCLIFFE

EARL OF SUSSEX.

1655.

THOMAS RADCLYFFE,

THE circumstances, important as they were, of the [] of [] very great and good man, have been suffered till this day to lie scattered on the page of history ; and in the number, which [] not inconsiderable, of biographical omissions, no one has appeared to me so remarkable. Neither has his portrait (with one or two exceptions, so [] [] scarcely to challenge recollection,) been delivered to us by the graver. In a former work I gave a very slight sketch of his character, merely in a note, for the re-publication here of a few [] from which, perhaps, no apology [] be necessary. " This great man's conduct united [] [] splendid qualities of those eminent persons who jointly rendered Elizabeth's court an object of admiration to Europe, and was perfectly free from their faults. Wise and loyal [] Burghley, without his blind attachment to the monarch ; vigilant [] Walsingham, but disdaining his cunning ; magnificent [] Leicester, but incapable of hypocrisy ; and brave as Raleigh, with [] piety of a primitive Christian ; he seemed above the common objects of human ambition, and wanted, [] the expression may be allowed, [] [] shades of character which make men the heroes of history." Such [] the man whose story has [] yet been collectively imparted to [] world.

[] was born in 1526, the eldest son of Henry, second Earl of Sussex of the Radclyffes, by his [] lady, Elizabeth, daughter [] Thomas Howard, [] [] of Norfolk. [] was bred a statesman from his early youth, and was not only sent Ambassador by Queen Mary to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and [redacted] son, Philip the Fourth of Spain, to treat [redacted] her projected marriage to the latter Prince, but [redacted] for a time the office of Lord Deputy of Ireland, before he had attained his thirtieth year. Shortly after his father's death, which happened in 1556, he was appointed Chief Justice of [redacted] Royal Forests south of Trent, and in 1557, being then a Knight of the Garter, held the place of Captain of the Pensioners, and had a renewal of his commission as Lord Deputy. [redacted] also named him to that office immediately after she had mounted the throne; and in [redacted] constituted him her Lieutenant and Governor-General in Ireland. In [redacted] [redacted] to Germany, to invest the Emperor Maximilian the Second with the Order of the Garter, and returned to Vienna in [redacted] following year, [redacted] to [redacted] of a marriage between that Prince's brother, [redacted] Archduke Charles, [redacted] [redacted]. In 1569 he was appointed President of [redacted] North, a situation in those times always of the highest [redacted] and importance, [redacted] that peculiar juncture rendered infinitely [redacted] by [redacted] singular state of her [redacted] with Scotland, and [redacted] turbulent spirit of the [redacted] counties. Those circumstances led him [redacted] for the first time to assume a military character: he placed himself at the head of the troops in that quarter, and, while he wisely administered [redacted] civil affairs of [redacted] government by his orders from the camp, commanded with equal bravery and skill in a number of those predatory incursions to which the border-warfare was then confined. While he [redacted] employed in these services he [redacted] [redacted] of [redacted] Privy Council.

[redacted] returned, after two years' absence, to the melancholy duty of sitting in judgment with his peers, [redacted] Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, who was [redacted] only [redacted] kinsman, but his most dear friend, and whose ruin might be traced, in a great measure, [redacted] his neglect of the Earl's advice. [redacted] Sussex's suffrage on that occasion we are ignorant, but I believe the twenty-five Lords by whom [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] tried, were unani-

in verdict. as may, the unfortunate left a dying testimony of his affection to a judge whom he knew to be impartial. His last request was that George, Chain, Garter, might be given to Lord of Sussex. 1572, having become infirm, though scarcely beyond prime of life, he retired from severer duties to the office of Lord Chamberlain of the Household, which he held till his death. His last public service was in the treaty of 1571 with commissioners from Paris, to negotiate the long agitated treaty of marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou.

It may not be too much to say that in the list of her sellers she trusted this nobleman above all others; certain it is that among them so entirely deserved her confidence. Both these opinions are justified by the voice of history, and proved by his own letters, many of which I am proud of having formerly been the instrument of first producing to the world. He was probably in the strictest sense of the phrase, her privy counsellor, and therefore little of his political story has been within the reach of the historian. Between him and Leicester the most pure hatred subsisted, and Elizabeth, who there it strong to suspect dreaded the resentment of the latter rather from private than public motives, perhaps durst not consult his great enemy but in secret. In his confidential letters to her, addressed her with freedom, as well as the kindness, of a friend: writing to her, at great length, on the twenty-eighth of August, 1578, on the question of the French marriage, which was then agitated, he uses these expressions:—"You shall, by the helps of your husband, be habell to compell K. of Spayne to reasonabell condytyons of subjects in Lowe Contryes, and State to take reasonabell condytyons of ther K. as he may have that which before God dothe justely belong him, and they may enjoye ther lybertyes, fredomes, and other thynges that ther quyet and suertye, bodies, goods, consciences, and lyves; wherby you shall avoyde grete effraym of Crystyen blodd, and shall have the honor and reward, dow in this wordell and by God, to = gracyouse, godly, and Crystyen actyons: and herewith, for the = suerty of all persones = matra, yonzelfe maye have in your = hands = marytyme porte, to be by you kepte, = the charge of the K. = Spayne; = your = maye have some frontyer townes in lyke sorte; and bothe to be contynued for such a number of yeres as may bryng a settelyng of suerty to all respects; by which meanes you shall also be delyvered from perrells, at home and abroad, that maye growe from the K. of Spayne. And, yf you lyke not of this corse in dealyng for the Lowe Contryes, you may joyne with your husband, = so, betwene you, attempte to possesse the hole Lowe Contryes, and drawe the same to the Crowne of England, yf you have eny chyld by him; or, yf you have none, to devyde them betwene the realmes of England and Fraunce, as = be mettest for ether; but, to be playne with your Majesté, I do not thynk this corse to be so juste, so godly, so honorabell, nor, when it is loked into = bottome, so = for you and your State as the other, although at the first syght it do perhaps carrye in shewe some plausybylyté," &c.

From this instance of the manner of his private correspondence, we will turn to an example of the = style which he used in his quality of an Ambassador. In a letter from Vienna = the eighteenth of October, 1567, he thus describes = Archduke Charles:—"His Highnes is of person higher suerly a good deale then my L. Marques: his heare of = and bearde of a lighte aborne: his face well proportioned, amiable, and of a very good compleccen, without shewe of readnesse or over paleness; his countenance and speche cherefull, very curteowse, and not withowte = state: his body wellshaped, withowte deformitie or blemishe: his hands very good and fayer: his leggs cleane, well proportioned, and of sufficient bignes for his stature: his fote as good as may be: so as, upon my dutie to your Majesté, I find not one deformitie, mis-shape, or any thyng to be noted worthy mislikinge, in his person; but, contrarywise, I see shape to good, worthy comendacyon and likyngs in all respects, and such as is rarely to be founde in such a Prince. His Highnes, beside his naturall language Duche, speaketh very well Spanish and Italian, and I heare, Latine. His dealyngs with be very wise; cyon such moche contenteth me; and, as I heare, none retorneth discontented from his company. He greatly beloved of all. The chiefe gallants of these parts be his men, and follow his Corte: the of them have travelled other contrais, speake many language, behave themselvs thereafter; and truly we be gladd there to have him to us, as they wilbe sadde here to have him go from them. He is reported to be wise, liberall, valeante, and of greates courage, which in the last he well showed in defending all his contrais free from the Turk, with owne force onely, and gevinge them diverse overthrowes when they attempted any thinge against his rules; and he universally (which I most weye) noted to be of suche vertue he spotted or touched with any notable vice cryme, which is moche of Prynce of his yeares, indued with such qualities. deliteth moche in huntynge, ridynge, hawkinge, exercise of feats of armes, and hearinge of musicke, wherof he hathe very good. hath, as I heare, some understandinge in astronomy and cosmography, taketh pleasure in clocks that sett forth the the planetts. hath for porcyon," &c. &c.

We have here the pen of an historian in the hand of a statesman; a pure, simple, and exalted, method of composition which arose out of the nature of the writer, and which differed widely from the turgid quaintness which was the fashion of his time as the character of his own mind and heart from those of his compeers. I trust I shall be excused for adding one more short extract, as it is so highly illustrative of the qualities of both, from a letter, written in a moment of anger, to Sir William Cecil, the twenty-third of January, 1571. After stating the ground of his complaint, which related to some judicial matters in his office of President of the North, he proceeds—"I was first a Lieutenant: I was after little better then a Marshall: (I had then nothing left to me but to direct hanging matters; in the tyme all was disposed that was within my comission) and I am offered to be made a shrieve's bayly, to deliver over possessions. Blame me not, good Mr. Secretarie, though my pen utter somewhat of swell in my stomake, for I see I am but kepte for a brome, and when I have done my office to be throwen owt of the dore. I am the nobelman hathe ben thus used. Trewe service deserveth honor and credite, and not reproche and defaming: but, seeing the one is ever dalyvered to me in of the other, I must leave to serve, or lose my honor; which, being continewed so long in my howse, I lothe shoold take blemishe from lacke of good and honorabell meaning in the Q. Majestie towards me, nor from lacke of dewty and trewthe in me towards her, which greveth me the more; and therefore, seing I shalbe still a camelyon, and yelde no other shewe then as it shall please others to give the couller, I will content myself to live a private lyfe. send her Majestie others that mean as well as I have done."

was his variety of talent, of cultivation, a period when the closest application of the dry and obscure subtleties of logic to theological or political controversy was considered the highest proof of mental accomplishment. For his integrity, his loyalty, and his exalted sense of honour, it might be sufficient to say that he was the only one of Elizabeth's servants, rarely distinguished as of them were, on whom the slightest suspicion never fell. His conduct in his government of Ireland was equally sagacious, resolute and humane. "By his prudence," Fuller, "he caused that actual rebellion not out there; no wonder if ■ time it ■ not ■ there, seeing his diligence dispersed the clouds before they could gather together." Even ■ foreign negotiations ■ have been conducted in that spirit of candour which never ■ him, for in ■ many diplomatic despatches which I have perused, I never discovered an instance of active deception ; yet his ■ in ■ character ■ taxed with weakness ■ imprudence. ■ bitter enmity to the favourite, Leicester, in common with the rest of his sentiments, was open and professed. ■ was a war of wisdom against cunning ; of truth against hypocrisy ; of virtue against guilt. " A constant court faction," says Fuller again, " ■ maintained between him and Robert Earl of Leicester, so that the Sussexians and Leicesterians divided the court, whilst the Cecilians, as neutrals, did look upon them. Sussex ■ the honestest man, and greater soldier ; Leicester the more facete courtier, ■ deep politician, not for the general good, but his particular profit. Great ■ the animosity betwixt them, and what in vain the Queen endeavoured death performed, taking this Earl" (Sussex) " away, and so the competition ■ at an end." Camden, too, who ■ to suppose that this discord originated in their vehement opposition of opinion on the treaty of marriage with the Archduke, informs ■ " they divided ■ court into parties and factions ; and the Earls, whenever they went abroad, carried great retinues of servants, with swords and bucklers, with iron pikes pointing out at the bosses, according to the then mode, as if they resolved to have ■ trial ■ for it." Yet Sussex's indignation could not abate his sense of justice. When Elizabeth, in a par- ■ jealousy on the ■ discovery of Leicester's marriage to the Countess of Essex, would have committed him to ■ Tower, Sussex, " out of ■ solid judgment, and the innate generosity of his own mind," as Camden well says, dissuaded her from it, " being of opinion that no man was to be troubled for lawful marriage, which amongst all men had ever been held in honour and esteem."

He was one of the very few of Elizabeth's servants who experienced any substantial proofs of her gratitude. She granted to him in 1563 several valuable manors and estates in Essex, particularly the noble palace and park of Newhall in the parish of Boreham, which Henry the Eighth, whose favourite residence it was, had enlarged to a vast extent, and to which he had given the name Beaulieu. There Sussex lived in the utmost profusion even of feudal magnificence and hospitality. The singular splendour of the place suited the grandeur of his spirit, and he was anxious to attach it firmly to his family; yet it was sold by his nephew even as early as the year 1620 to Villiers Duke of Buckingham. He resided occasionally too at his mansion of Woodham Walter, and Attleburgh, in Norfolk, and at his manor of Bermondsey, where he died on the ninth of June, 1583. He was buried at Boreham, and we find in his will a curious proof of the great expense which was then usually bestowed on the funerals of the great. He says, "I desire that my body shall be by myne executors, decently and comely, without unnecessary pomp or charges, but only having respect to my dignity and state, buried in the parish church of Boreham, in Essex, where I will that my funerals shall be performed and kept, provided always, and my will is, that myne executors shall not dispend in and about my funerall obsequies more than fifteen hundredth pounds;" a sum at least equal to ten thousand pounds in our time, but then prescribed as for a private funeral, and in the certainty that his executors would have far exceeded it, had he not thus limited them.

This great Earl was twice married, first to Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, by whom he had two sons, Henry, and Robert, both of whom died young. By his second, Frances, daughter of William, son of Sir Henry, aunt of Philip Sidney, the foundress by her will of Sidney College in Cambridge, he had no issue. His next brother, Henry, therefore succeeded to his honours and estates.

EDWARD CLINTON,

1690-1744 LINCOLN.

■ family of ■ nobleman ■ enjoyed ■ dignity ■
■ Peerage nearly for three hundred years, yet, with the exception of its ■ ancestor, Geoffery de Clinton, whom ■ first styled Lord Chamberlain, Treasurer to the King, and Justice of England, under Henry the First, ■ of his progenitors appear to have held any public situations, beyond such municipal offices as are usually filled by ■ of large ■ in their respective provinces. ■ the only ■ of Thomas, eighth Lord Clinton, by Mary, a natural daughter of Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter; and it ■ probable that ■ small share of the favour in which that gentleman ■ held by Henry the Eighth, devolved on this
■ nobleman through ■ marriage.

■ was born in the year 1512, and ■ the death ■ his father, which occurred ■ the seventh of August, 1517, fell in wardship to the Crown. Educated in the Court, ■ youth ■ passed in those magnificent ■ romantic ■ ments which distinguished the commencement of Henry's reign; nor was ■ till 1544, that he appeared in any public character. ■ that year he attended the ■ of Hertford, ■ Dudley, Lord Lisle, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, in their expedition ■ Scotland, and ■ said ■ to have engaged in the naval service in consequence of his intimacy with the latter, who commanded the English fleet.
■ knighted ■ Leith by Hertford, who commanded ■ chief, ■ then embarked with ■ admiral, Lisle, who having scoured the coast of Scotland, landed at Boulogne, which was at that time besieged by the King in person.

At the commencement of the following reign he was appointed admiral of the fleet which aided the Protector's great irruption into Scotland; and, owing to a singular circumstance, is said to have had a considerable share in the victory of Musselborough, without quitting his ships; the Lord van der Burgh, the English army having changed its position, the Scots imagined it was flying to the fleet, and so forsook the high ground on which they had been advantageously posted, and, following the English on the shore, were received with a furious discharge of cannon, which threw them into irrecoverable disorder. Soon after this period Lord Clinton was constituted Governor of Boulogne, and, on his return from thence, after the peace of 1550, was appointed of the King's Privy Chamber; Lord Admiral of England for life; and a Knight of the Garter. To these distinctions were added grants of estates to a very considerable amount. In 1551 he represented his royal master at Paris, as godfather to the third son of France, afterwards Henry the Third. He negotiated at the same time the fruitless treaty of marriage intended between Edward the Sixth, and Elizabeth, daughter of Henry the Second of France, and brought home with him the instrument of ratification.

Edward died soon after the conclusion of the embassy, and Lord Clinton, having recommended himself to the favour of that Prince's favourite by his early expression of attachment to his title of the Crown, was in 1554, together with others of the loyal nobility, at the head of a military force, against Thomas Wyatt. In the autumn of the next year he carried the Order of the Garter to Emanuel, Duke of Savoy; and in 1557 he had a principal command in the English army at the siege of St. Quentin. On the thirteenth of February, 1558, O. S., his patent of Lord Admiral was renewed, and on the twelfth of April following, he was appointed Commander-in-chief, both by sea and land, of the forces then against France and Scotland. ~~Elizabeth~~ continued him in the post of Admiral ; chose him of her Privy council ; appointed him a Commissioner to examine Murray's charges against ~~the~~ Queen of Scots : and joined him to Dudley, Earl of Warwick, ~~in~~ command of the army sent in 1569 against ~~the~~ rebellious ~~the~~ Northumberland and Westmoreland. He ~~was~~ of the twenty-five Peers, who, in January, 1572, N.S., ~~was~~ in judgment ~~the~~ Thomas, Duke of Norfolk. On the ~~first~~ of ~~the~~ succeeding May, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl ~~of~~ Lincoln, and was immediately after despatched ~~to~~ Paris, with a splendid train of nobility ~~and~~ gentry, to ~~the~~ ratification of the treaty of Blois by Charles the Ninth.

The remainder of his life presents nothing worthy of note, for we find only that he was occasionally employed in the ~~the~~ formalities of that tedious treaty of marriage with Francis, Duke of Anjou, ~~the~~ motives for the commencement and dissolution of which, were ever equally unknown, ~~the~~ to those of her ministers whom she most trusted. ~~It~~ should seem, indeed, that there ~~was~~ little historically eminent in this nobleman's character : that he ~~was~~ valued by the monarchs whom he served rather for his probity and his fidelity than for his talents, which being probably of a sort and measure best adapted to the conduct of warlike affairs, afforded little worth remembrance during the long ~~the~~ public tranquillity which detached him from such services. ~~His~~ imperfect judgment of ~~his~~ powers ~~in~~ his mind may be formed from ~~the~~ two following letters to Lord Burghley, written at different periods of his life, and ~~the~~ first published, from the ~~the~~ collection : ~~the~~ indeed ~~the~~ they otherwise destitute of interest, particularly the second, written ~~the~~ while the detestable Prince, of whose oath of perpetual amity with Elizabeth it chiefly treats, ~~the~~ secretly planning the horrors of ~~the~~ massacre of ~~the~~ Bartholomew, which were perpetrated within very few weeks after ~~the~~ date of his ~~the~~ perjury, and of Lincoln's despatch.

"After my most hartie comendacions unto your good Lordship, albeit you shall by the letters from my L.L. of the Cownsell understaund the good newis y^e ar com toching the peace between the Quene's Ma^{ty} and the French toching the matters of Skotland, yet I take occasyon to trowble your L. wth this my letter y^e it may appeare I am not slothfull in wryting to yow. This peace is gretely to the Quene's honour, and [redacted] My Lord of Norfolk [redacted] to Lyth, to see the demolyahing of the [redacted]. The newis doth styll contynew of the comyng of the yong King of Swevya, who bringeth xxx shyps of war, and lx others to carre his trayne and vytella. Yesterday the Kyng of Spayne's Ambassadors were here, who resseyved knolayg of her Hynes of the peace concludyd in Skotland. The tewnolts in France do [redacted] tynew. Monsieur de Glasnyon told me yesterday y^e the Duke of Savoy was in gret danger, becyde his owne towne off Nyce, to a byn taken by the Turks, bot skaped naroly, his horse being sore hert under hym. xii of his prynsepoll noble men and gentylmen [redacted] by the Turks takyn and carraid away. The Kyng of Spayne's los at Geriby is confermyd by other letters. I have lernyd for certen y^e the French preparacions are small to the see. It [redacted] brewtyd here y^e the Dewk [redacted] Namours doth com wth a gret company of Noble men to vyset the Quene's Ma^{ty} from the French Kyng. Many letters ar going owt from the Quene to the nobylty of this reame to com to the Corte agen the coming of this yong Kyng of Swevya. I trust we shall be in quyt wth France untill they have ther owne cowntrey in a good ordar [redacted] subjectyon, but, when tyme shall [redacted] them, ther wylbe no gret trust to them, as I juge this peace hath ben parfors, for they were dryven to take it in thys sort, or els have lost all ther pypyll in Lyth, being not able to socor them. My Lord of Penbrek doth somwat amend of [redacted] syknes, God be thankyd, and [redacted] yesterday from the Corte to London, and so to Hynden. When othar matters shall com worthe

wrytyng I wyll adverte your L. From the Corte, ■■■■ xiiiith of July, ■■■■

Your L'. assured ■■■■ com'and,
E. CLYNTON."

"MY LORD,

"I have advertized your L. from tyme to tyme of my enterteynment synce my comynge from Ballyn, whiche, ■■■■ ther was no ordar taken for provisions of the Kyng's chargis for me on ■■■■ waye hyther, yet I ■■■■ you I was vearie honorablie used and enterteyned, ■■■■ I have afore wrytten ;
■■■■ as I p'ceive, they here weare utterlie without knowledge that there was suche ordar taken by the Quene's Ma^m for the receyvinge of Monsieur Monmerancie in England, whereof there hathe ben great mislykunge taken against suche as shoulde have gyven knowledge hyther. But synce my comyng to Parris ther hathe ben as greates enterteynement and honor done me, in respects of her Majestie, ■■■■ I ever have seene, and all at the Kyng's chargis.

"On Fridaye last I ■■■■ ■■■■ for to come to Madryll to the Kyng. The Prince Dolphyn, wth many noble men, wher'of ■■■■ Marshall Cossie, being one, dyd accompany ■■■■ to the Court, wheare at my comyng the Kyng dyd welcom me vearie honorablie, his brethren, and a great assemblie of noble ■■■■ being wyth hym. That daie ■■■■ Kyng cawsed me, and the Quene's Ma^m Imbassadors, to dyne wth him and ■■■■ brethren.
We ■■■■ ■■■■ dynar brought to the Quene, ■■■■ wth, by the Duke Dalanson, at whiche tyme the Quene mother was sicke, and ■■■■ deferred our comynge to her for that daye. We weare lodged in ■■■■ Kyng's howse theare, and hadd greates enterteynement, wheare we remained Frydaie ■■■■ Satterdaie, ■■■■ tyme the Kyng ■■■■ sache ■■■■ enterteyne-ments as he tooke me wyth hym after ■■■■ supper to walke in ■■■■ parke, and he played at the Tennys, in the fyldes at Randon, with the noble men, and caried me late to ■■■■ pryvis chamber, ■■■■ did ■■■■ with me vearie pryvatlye.

■ had som pastyme showed hym by Italian players, whiche I was at wth hym. On Satterdaie he towlde me his mother was not vearie well, but ■ things amended, and yet ■ wolde have me see her, and so hymself brought me to her, and her Majestie's Imbasadors, she being in her bedd, wheare I dyd her Ma^{ty} commendacions, ■ delyvered her ■ letters. The next daye, beinge Sondaie, appoynted for the oathe to be taken at a parishe church in Parris, the Kyng, wythe ■ twoo brethren, entred ■ a coche, ■ tooke me in the said coche wth theym, and so passed thwoughe a great part of Parris to the Lovar, ■ he dyned, ■ greate and sumptuous preparacion for hym, and a greate assemblie of noble men and gentlemen; and theare I, wythe her Ma^{ty} Imbasadours, dyned wythe the Kyng and his brethren.

After dynar, at Evensonge tyme, the Kyng went to the aforesaid church, and I have not scene a greater assemblie of people of all sortes, so that it was longe ■ the Kyng cowlde passe the prease, for all that his offycers cowlde commaunde to make place. At his comynge to the said church, wth was rythlie furnished, and hanged wythe arras, and a place in the quyer dressed for the Kyng and the noble man, after we hadd brought him ■ the quyer, ■ he was sett, we retyred o'selves to a chappell on the syde of the ■ church appoynted for us, where we remayned, accompanied wythe the Duke of Bolleyn, and Monsieur de Lansack, and others, untill the Kyng had hard his evensong, and then we ■ sent for by the Prynce Dolphyn to the Kyng, ■ theare, at the highe autler, he took his oathe; and afore he dyd swears he towld me openly that ther was nothing that ever contented hym better than this league betwene the Quene, his good systar, and hym, being so noble and worthie a Pryncys as she ys; and, as he dyd publykelye ■ oathe, accordyng to ■ order ■ suche ■ dyd ■ p^ronounce that he dyd yt from his harte, as the thyng that he wolde trewlye and justlye observe and keepe duryng his lyfe, wythe such a shewe of a contentacyon as I have not seene the lyke. I noted his speache to me before dynar, spoken afore his brethren, and the greatest part of the Prynces and noble men there, w^{ch} was that the ordar and custome hath ben alwaies in Fraunce that when anie Kyng or Quene dyed, or other greates of their Howse, as now the Quene of Navarre, they dyd mourne in theyr apparell, and dyd weare y^e for one monthe at the leaste; but he, havinge receyved such newes to rejoyce in this amitie, whearto he wold sweare that daye, and for the greates honor he dyd beare to the Quene's Ma^{ty}, his good systar, he wolde not apparell accordyng to the contentments of his mynde, therefore he dyd put off all mourning, and indeede he and his brethren weare ryche apparessed.

The Kyng spon Sondaie last towlde me that bothe his brethren, for the greates honor they beare to her Ma^{ty} dyd desier to have me, and bothe her Ma^{ty} Imbassadours, and the noble men and gentlemen in her companys, to dyne wth them uppon Tewesdaie and the next followyng: so uppon Tewesdaie we dyned wyth Monsieur, who sent for us twoo of the brethren of Monsieur de Momeransie, and Lansack, and Larchaunt, and dyvers others. And we owre comyng, the Duke and his brother dyd mete us wythout his greates chamber, accompanied wythe the Duke Monpansier, and his son Prynce Dolphyn, and the Duke de Navarre and Bullyen, and Domall, and Guyse, and the Marshall de Cossie, and Danvyle, who all dyned wth hym. At after dynar Mons^{ie} and his brother browght us to a chambre wheare was vearie many sorte of exelent musicks; and after that he hadd us to another large chambre, wheare there was an Italian playe, and dyvers vautre and lepers of dyvers sortes, vearie exelent; and thus that daie was spent. I doo heare that the Duke Dalanson doothe this daie make greates preparacion to feast us, wherof I wyll advertize you by my next letare. And thus I take my leave of yo^r good L. wishinge yo^r L. long lief, in much honor.

From the Lover in Paris, this Wednesday, in the mornynge, beyng [REDACTED] xviiiith of June, [REDACTED]

Y^e L^d' assured friend to com^{and},
 [REDACTED] LYNCOLENE."

"Her hath ben hether to me worde spekyn to me, ether by the Kyng or his mother, toockynge the Quene of Skotts, or the Duke [REDACTED] Scurly, my Lord, here is shoid gret contentasyon of this amytye."

The Earl of Lincoln died on the nineteenth of January, 1584, O.S., and was buried in St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, under a superb monument of alabaster and porphyry, which was some years since repaired, with laudable care and nicety, by the direction of his noble descendant, the late Duke of Newcastle. [REDACTED] was thrice married: first, to Elizabeth, daughter of [REDACTED] John Blount, and widow to Gilbert, Lord Talboys. By this lady, who had formerly admitted the carcases of Henry the Eighth, [REDACTED] had [REDACTED] daughters; Bridget, married to Robert Dymock, of Scrivelsby, in Lincolnshire; Catherine, to William, Lord Berough; and Margaret, to Charles, Lord Willoughby of Parham. By his second wife, Ursula, daughter of Edward, Lord Stourton, he had three sons; Henry his successor; Edward, and Thomas; and two daughters; Anne, wife of William Aynough, of Kelsey, in Lincolnshire; and Frances, of Giles Bruges, Lord [REDACTED] He married, thirdly, Elizabeth, daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald, [REDACTED] of Kildare, who [REDACTED] without issue.

PHILIP SIDNEY.

BIOGRAPHY, like painting, derives a main interest from contrast of strong lights and shadows. The glowing serenity of Italian skies, and the constant verdure of our own plains, delight us in nature, but on the canvass we look for tempestuous clouds, and rocky precipices, to break the uniformity of milder beauties; and, however necessary it may be the judgment should be assured of the truth the representation, yet, all events, the fancy must be gratified. So it is with the reality and the picture of human life. The virtues which adorned the living man are posthumous story, without the opposition of instances of infirmity or extravagance. Whether envy or perfection, a hasty prejudice which may have induced us to suppose that cannot exist in the human character, or a just experience of its extreme rarity, that renders the portrait displeasing, unnatural, or at best insipid; or whether, under the influence of the secret principle of selfishness, virtue, in losing its power of conferring benefits, may not seem to have lost most of its beauty, are questions not to be solved; the fact, however, is incontrovertible.

Under the pressure of these reflections, and of others nearly as discouraging, I sit down to write some account of the life of PHILIP SIDNEY, whose character displays almost unvaried excellence; whose splendour of talents, and purity of mind, were, if possible, exceeded by the simplicity and kindness of his heart; whose short, matchless career was closed by a death in which the highest military glory was even more than rivalled, not by those degrees of consolation usually derived from religion and patience, but by the piety of a saint, and the constancy of a stoic: a life too which has so frequently been the theme of the biographer; of which all public facts are probably already recorded, and on which all terms of panegyric seem to have been exhausted.

Sir Philip Sidney was born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1554. His family was of high antiquity, Sir Philip Sidney, his lineal ancestor, a native of Anjou, having accompanied Henry the Second from thence, and afterwards waited on that Prince as one of his Chamberlains. From this courtly origin the Sidneys retired suddenly into privacy, and settled themselves in Surrey and Sussex, where they remained for nearly four hundred years in the character of country gentlemen, till Nicholas Sidney, who was twelfth in descent from William, married Anne, daughter of Sir William Brandon, and aunt and co-heir to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, a match which gave him a sort of family connexion to Henry the Eighth, and probably drew him to the court. William, his only son, became successively an esquire of the body, a chamberlain, steward, and gentleman, of the privy chamber, to that Prince, whom he afterwards repeatedly served with distinguished credit both in his fleets and armies, and from whom he received the honour of knighthood. To this Sir William, who is thus especially spoken of, because he may be esteemed the principal founder of the subsequent splendour of his family, Henry granted, in 1547, several manors and lands which had lately fallen to the crown by the attainder of Sir Ralph Vane, particularly the honour and park of Penshurst in Kent. He too left an only son, Sir Henry Sidney, the dear friend of King Edward the Sixth, who died in his arms, one of Elizabeth's well-chosen knights of the garter, the celebrated governor of Ireland, and President of Wales; a wise statesman, a true patriot, and a most honourable and beneficent gentle-

Of three sons, by Mary, eldest daughter of the great miserable John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, our Philip Sidney.

With such zeal every scattered fragment relative to this admirable person been preserved, that the circumstances of his very infancy would form a collection of extensive whole history of many a long eminent life. "Of youth," says Fulke Greville, one of his school-fellows, his first biographer, "I will report no other than this; that though I lived with him, and knew him from a child, yet I never knew him other than a man; with such a steadiness of mind, lovely and familiar gravity, carried grace and above greater years; his talk of knowledge, and his very play tending to enrich his mind, so as even his teachers found something in to observe and learn, above that which they had usually read taught." In order that he might be near his family, which resided at Ludlow Castle during Sir Henry's Presidency of Wales, he was placed at a school in the town of Shrewsbury, and to have been no other; yet we find him, the age of twelve years, writing to his father, not only in Latin, but in French, and doubtless with correctness at least, since no is uttered in his epistles by his father, from whom we have the fact. It is communicated in a letter to him from Sir Henry, so excellent in every point of consideration, and more particularly as it should to have been the very mould in which the son's future character was cast, that I cannot help regretting that great length, not to mention that has lately been published by Dr. Zouch, render unfit to form a part of present sketch.

removed to Christchurch in the University of Oxford in 1569, and placed under the of Dr. Thomas Thornton, (who became through a Canon of house), assisted by Robert Dornett, afterwards Dean Chester. Dr. Thornton the gratuitous preceptor of Camden, and introduced him to Sidney, who became afterwards one of most earnest patrons: and that faithful historian, who so well and so early knew him, has [redacted] us that "he was born into [redacted] world [redacted] show unto [redacted] age [redacted] example [redacted] virtues." Sidney studied also for some time at Cambridge, and there confirmed that [redacted] friendship with Greville which had commenced at their school, and which the latter, with a warmth which the lapse of more than forty surviving years had not impaired, so emphatically commemorates [redacted] [redacted] own tomb, in the collegiate church of Warwick, by this inscription—"Fulke Greville, servant to Queen Elizabeth, counsellor to King James, [redacted] friend to [redacted] Philip Sidney."

[redacted] concluded his academical studies [redacted] seventeen years of [redacted] and on the twenty-sixth of May, 1572, departed for France with Edward Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, and Admiral, then appointed by Elizabeth her ambassador extraordinary. [redacted] uncle Leicester, who probably cared little for talents in which cunning had no place, gave him on that occasion [redacted] letter to Sir Francis Walsingham, then resident minister [redacted] Paris, in which [redacted] says "he is young and rawe, and no doubt shall find those countries, and the demeanours of the people, somewhat strange to him, in which respect your good advice and counsell shall greatlie behove him," &c. He was received with great distinction. Charles the Ninth appointed him a gentleman of his bedchamber, and he became familiarly known to Henry, King of Navarre, and is said to have been highly esteemed by that great [redacted] amiable Prince. Charles's favour [redacted] him, [redacted] [redacted] true, had been considered [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] a feature [redacted] the plan of that evil hour to lull the Protestants into [redacted] security during the preparations for the diabolical massacre of St. Bartholomew, [redacted] burst forth [redacted] [redacted] twenty-second of August, within a fortnight after he had been admitted into [redacted] office. Sidney, on that [redacted] occasion, sheltered [redacted] in the house [redacted] Walsingham, and quitted Paris as soon as the storm had subsided.

After a circuitous journey through Lorrain, by Strasburgh, [redacted] Heidelburgh, he rested [redacted] [redacted] time [redacted] Frankfort, where [redacted] acquainted with Languet, resident minister there for the Elector of Saxony ; a man who the profoundest erudition joined the intimate knowledge of the history, the laws, the political systems, and the of modern Europe ; and whose eminent qualifications received their last polish from an upright heart, and a benign temper. At an age when men usually retire to the society of the friends of their youth, and the flatterers of their opinions, age selected youthful Sidney, not only as his pupil, but as the companion of his leisure, and the depository of confidence. "That day on which I first beheld with my eyes," says Languet, "shone propitious me." They passed together most part of the three years which Sidney devoted to travels, and, when absent from each other, corresponded incessantly by letters. Languet's epistles have been than once published, and amply prove truth of these remarks ; nor are Sidney's testimonials of gratitude and affection to unrecorded.

Having halted long at Vienna, travelled through Hungary, and passed into Italy, where he resided chiefly at Venice and Padua, and, without visiting Rome, which, it said, he doubt truly, that he afterwards much regretted, he returned England about May, 1575, and immediately after, then little more than twenty-one years of age, appointed ambassador to the Emperor Rodolph. The professed object of the mission was mere condolence on the death of that Prince's father ; but Sidney had secret instructions negotiate a union the Protestant states against the Pope and Philip of Spain ; and the subsequent been ascribed to his arguments and address. transacting these affairs he became acquainted with William, first Prince of Orange, and with Don John of Austria ; those heroes, perhaps in every other instance uniformly opposed to each other, united, not only in their tribute of applause, but in actual friendship with him. William, in particular, a constant correspondence with public of Europe, and designated him as "one ripest and greatest counsellors of state of that day in Europe."

Sidney returned from his embassy in 1577, and passed the eight succeeding years undistinguished by any public appointment. His spirit was too high for the court, and his integrity too stubborn for the cabinet. Elizabeth, who always expected implicit submission, could not long have such a servant; yet he occasionally advised her with the freedom, and she received his counsel with gentleness. This we have a remarkable instance in his letter to her, written at great length, in 1579, against the proposed match with the Duke of Alençon, after of Anjou, which may be found in the Cabala, and in Collins's Sidney Papers, and which Hume has pronounced to be written "with an unusual elegance of expression, as well as force of reasoning." Sir Fulke Greville calls him "an exact image of quiet and action, happily united in him, and seldom well divided in others;" activity, however, the ruling feature in the mechanism of his nature, while the keenest sensibility reigned in his heart. Perhaps, too, if we may venture to suppose that Sidney had a fault, those mixed dispositions produced in him their usual effect, an impatience and petulance of temper which the general grandeur of his mind was calculated rather to aggravate than to soften. Hence in this his time of leisure, he fell into some excesses, which in an ordinary person, so much human judgment awayed by the character of the subject, might perhaps rather have challenged credit than censure. Such were his quarrels with the Earls of Ormond and Oxford, one too worthy, the other too contemptible, the object of such a man's resentment. Ormond was suspected by Sidney of having endeavoured to prejudice the Queen against his father, and had therefore been purposely affronted by him; the Earl nobly said (as appears by a letter in Collins's Papers to Sir Henry Sidney), "that he would accept no quarrel from a gentleman who was bound by nature to defend his father's cause, and who was otherwise furnished with so many virtues as he knew Mr. Philip to be." We were not told, however, that Sidney was satisfied. Oxford was a brute and a madman; insulted him at a tennis-court, without a cause, with the utmost vulgarity of manners and language: yet, so angry was Sidney, that the privy council, finding their endeavours to prevent a quarrel would be ineffectual, were obliged to solicit Elizabeth to interpose her authority. Her argument on this occasion, with him, he condescended to argue, too curious to be omitted. "She laid before him," says Fulke Greville, "the difference in degree between earls and gentlemen; the respect inferiours owed to their superiors; and the necessity in princes to maintain their own creations, as degrees descending between the people's licentiousness and the anointed reignity of crowns; and how the gentleman's neglect of his nobility taught the peasant to insult both." Sidney combated his royal reasoning with freedom and firmness, but submitted. He retired, however, for many months, much disgusted, into the country; and, in that season of quiet, thus forced upon him, is supposed to have composed his Arcadia. These things happened in 1580; but the strongest and most blameable instance of his intemperance was he found in a letter from him, on the 31st of May, 1578, to Mr. Edward Molineux, a gentleman of ancient family, and secretary to his father, whom he had hastily, and very unjustly, suspected of a breach of confidence. Let it speak for itself, and, saving us the pain of remarking further on it, allow us to take leave of the sole imperfection of Sidney's character.

■ MR. MOLINEUX,

■ Few wordes are best. My letters to my father have come to the eyes of some; neither do I condemne any but you for it. ■ it be so, yow have plaide the very knave with me, and so I will make yow know, if I have good proofe of it; but that for so muche as is past; for that is to come, I assure yow before God, that if ever I knowe you do so muche as reade any lettre I wryte to my father, without his commandement, or my consente, I thruste my dagger into yow; and truste to it, for I speake it in earnest. I mean tyme farewell.

"By me,

"SIDNEY. SCDNEY."

About this time he represented the county of Kent in Parliament, where he frequently was actively engaged in public business. He sat in 1582 on a most select committee for the devising new laws against the Pope and his adherents. In the same year the proposals for the French marriage were earnestly renewed; the Duke of Anjou visited Elizabeth; and, after several months' ineffectual suit, through her wisdom or folly, finally, but pompously dismissed. Sidney was appointed one of the splendid embassy which attended him to Antwerp, and we find him, soon after his return, soliciting for employment. "The Queen," says he, in a letter to Lord Burghley, of the twenty-seventh of January, 1582, "at my L. of Warwick's request, hath bene pleased to join me in his office of ordinance; and, as I learn, her Majestie yields gracious heering unto it. My suit to your L. will favour and furdre it, which I truly affirme unto your L. I much more desyre for the being busied in a thing of some serviceable experience than for any other comoditie, which is but small that can arise from it." His request was unsuccessful, and he was perhaps owing to this disappointment that he devoted the whole of his next year to literary leisure, one result of which is said to have been his "Defence of Poesy." In 1583 he married Frances, the only surviving daughter of Francis Walsingham, by whom, two years afterwards, he had an only child, Elizabeth, who became the wife of Roger Manners, Earl of Rutland; and on the thirteenth of January in that year was knighted at Windsor, as a qualification for his serving as proxy for John, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, at an installation of the order of the Garter.

It is strange that almost immediately after his disinterested marriage to a young woman of exquisite beauty and accomplishments, he should have laid a plan to accompany Drake, in his second voyage, all the great objects of which it was agreed should be committed to his management. The whole had been devised and matured with the utmost secrecy, and it should seem that he was actually on board when a peremptory mandate arrived from the Queen to stay him. A speculation, the extravagance of which was perhaps equal to its honour, awaited his return. ■ was invited to enrol himself among the candidates for the crown of Poland, vacant ■ 1585 by the death of Stephen Bathori: and this historical fact affords a stronger general proof of the fame of his transcendent character than all the united testimonies even of his contemporaries. That a young man, sprung from a family not yet ennobled; unemployed, save in a solitary embassy, by his own sovereign; passing perhaps the most part of his time in literary seclusion; ■ have been solicited even to be certainly unsuccessful in so glorious a race, would be utterly incredible, were it not absolutely proved. Here Elizabeth's prohibition again interfered: "She refused," ■ Naunton, "to further his advancement, not only out of emulation, but out of fear to lose the jewel of her times." She became, however, now convinced that this mighty spirit must have a larger scope for action. Sidney was sworn of the Privy Council, and, on the seventh of November in the same year appointed Governor of Flushing, one of the most important of the towns then pledged to Elizabeth for the payment and support of her auxiliary troops, and General of the Horse, under his uncle Leicester, who was Commander-in-Chief of the English forces in the Low Countries. On the eighteenth of that month ■ arrived at Flushing, and, as it were by an act of mere volition, instantly assumed, together with his command, all the qualifications which it required. His original letters, preserved in our great national repository, abundantly prove that he was the ablest general in the field, and the wisest military counsellor in that service: of his bravery it is unnecessary to speak. I insert one of them addressed to Sir Francis Walsingham, and hitherto unpublished; not with the particular view of making that proof, but to give perhaps the strongest possible instance of the wonderful variety, as well as of the power of his rich mind: to exhibit the same Sidney whose pen had so lately been dedicated to the soft and sweet relaxation of poetry and pastoral romance, now writing from his tent, ~~amid~~ the ~~fire~~ of war, ~~with~~ the stern simplicity, and short-breathed impatience, of an old soldier. The letter, indeed, is in many other respects of singular curiosity. The view which it imperfectly gives us of his earnest zeal for the Protestant cause, of Elizabeth's feelings towards him, and of the wretched provision made at home for the campaign, are all highly interesting.

" RIGHT HONORABLE,

" I receave dyvers letters from you, full of the discomfort which I see, and am sorry to see, y^e yow daily meet with ~~at~~ home; and I think, such is y^e goodwill it pleaseth you to bear me, y^e my part of y^e trouble is something y^e troubles yow; but I beseech yow let ~~it~~ not. I had before cast my count of danger, want, and disgrace: and, before God, Sir, it is trew in my hart, the love of y^e cause doth so far over ballance them all, y^e, with God's grace, thei shall never make me weery of my resolution. If her Ma^y wear the fountain, I wold fear, considering what I daily fynd, y^e we should wax dry; but she ~~is~~ but a means whom God useth, and I know not whether I am deceived, but I am faithfully perswaded, y^e if she ~~draw~~ w^odraw herself, other springes wold ryse to help this action: for methinkes I see y^e great work indeed in hand against the abusers of the world, wherein it is no greater fault to have confidence in man's power, then it is too hastily to despair of God's work. I think a wyse and constant man ought never to greeve whyle he doth plaie, as a man may sai, his own part truly, though others be out; if he leav his other marriners be ydle, he will hardly forgive himself his own fault. For me, I can not promise any course, no, not of the . . . because I know there is a eyer power y' must uphold me, or else I shall fall; but certainly I trust I shall not by other man's be drawne from myself; therefore, good Sir, to whome for my particular I am more bound then to all men besydes, be not troubled my troubles, for I have the worst, in my judgement, beforehand, then y' can not bee.

"If the Queene pai not her souldiers she must loos her garrisons; ther is no dout thereof; but no man living shall be hable to sai the fault is in me. What releefe I can do them I will. I will spare no danger, if occasion serves. I am sure shall be hable lay injustice to my charge; and, for furdre doutes, truly I stand not appon them. I have writtten by Adams to the council plainli, and thereof lett them determin. It hath been a costly beginning unto me this war, by reason I had nothing proportioned unto it; my servantes unexperienced, myself every way; but hereafter, the continuw, I shall pas much better thorow with it. For Bergem up Zome, I delighted in it, I confess, because I was near the enemy; but especially, having a very fair howe in it, and an excellent air, I destenied it for my wyfe; but, fynding how yow there, and y' ill payment in my absence might bring forth much mischeef, and considering how apt the Queen is to interpret every thing to my disadvantage, I have resigned it to my Lord Willowghby, my very frend, and indeed a vaillant frank gentleman, and fit for y' place; therefore I pray yow know that so much of my regality is fals.

"I understand I am very ambitious and proud home, but certainly if they know my hart they would not altogether so judg me. I wrote to yow a letter by Will, my Lord of Lester's jesting plaier, enclosed in a letter to my wyfe, and I never had answer thereof. It contained something to my Lord of Lester, and counsell y^e som wai might be taken to stai my lady there. I, since, dyvers tymes have writt to know whether you had receaved them, but yow never answered me y^e point. I since find y^e the knave deliver'd the letters to my Lady of Lester, but whether she sent them yow or no I know not, but earnestly desyrs to do, because I dout there is more interpreted thereof. Mr. Erington is with me at Flushing, and therefore I think myself the more rest, having a man of his reputation; but I assure yow, Sir, in good earnest, I fynd Barlas another manner of a man than he is taken for, or I expected. I would to God, Burne had obtained his suit. He is earnest, but somewhat discomposed with consideration of his estate. Turner is good for nothing, and worst for y^e sownd of y^e hackbutes. We have a sore warr uppon us this sommer, wherein if appointment had been kept, and these disgraces forborn, we have greatly weakened us, we had been victorious. I can sai no more at this tyme, but prai for your long and happy lyfe. At Utrecht, this 24th of March, 1588.

"Your humble son,

"PH. SIDNEY.

"I know not what to sai to my wyve's coming till you resolve better; for if yow run a strange course, I may take such a one heere as will not be fitt for anye of the feminin gender. I prai yow make much of Nichol Gery. I have been vyldlie deceaved for amoures or horsemen; if yow cold speedily spare me any out of your armury, I will send them yow back as soon as my own be finished. There was never so good a father find a more troublesom son. Send Sir William Pelham, good Sir, and let him have Clerke's place, for we need no clerkes, and it is most necessary to have such a one in the counsell."

On the [redacted] of May, following the [redacted] [redacted] this letter, he lost [redacted] father, and on the ninth of August, his mother. Providence thus mercifully spared them [redacted] trial which [redacted] fast approaching. Sir Philip having highly distinguished himself in many actions of various fortune, commanding on the twenty-fourth of September [redacted] of [redacted] army, met accidentally [redacted] convey of the enemy, [redacted] way [redacted] Zutphen, [redacted] strong town of Guelderland, which they were then besieging. [redacted] attacked it with a very inferior force, and an engagement of uncommon fury ensued, [redacted] which having had [redacted] horse shot under him, [redacted] being remounted, he received a musket shot a little above the left knee, which shattered the bone, and passed upwards towards the body. As they were bearing him from the field of battle towards the camp (for the anecdote, though already [redacted] often told, cannot be too often repeated,) he became faint and thirsty from excess of bleeding, and [redacted] for water, which he [redacted] about to drink, when observing the eye of a dying soldier fixed on [redacted] glass, he resigned it to him, saying "Thy necessity is yet greater than mine." He was carried to Arnheim, and variously tortured by a multitude of surgeons and physicians for three weeks. Amputation, or the extraction of the ball, would have saved his inestimable life, but they were unwilling to practise the one, and knew not how to perform the other. In the short intervals which he spared during his confinement from severe exercises of piety he wrote verses on his wound, and made his will [redacted] uncommon length, and with the most scrupulous attention. Of that instrument, which is inserted, with [redacted] mistakes, in Collins's Sidney Papers, [redacted] [redacted] Greville most justly says, "This will of his, will ever remain for a witness to the world that those sweet and large, even dying, affections in him, [redacted] no more [redacted] contracted with the narrowness of pain, grief, or sickness, than any sparkle of our immortality can be privately buried in the shadow of death." [redacted] is dated the [redacted] day of September, 1586, and [redacted] seventeenth of October he added a codicil, with many tokens ■ regard to intimate friends. ■ small but interesting fact disclosed by that codicil, has hitherto escaped the notice ■ his biographers. It ends with these words : " I give to my good friends, Sir George Digby and Sir Henry Goodier, each a ring of" His dictation was interrupted by death.

Thus ended ■ life, doubtless of great designs, but of few incidents. ■ jealousy and timidity of Elizabeth denied to ■ Philip Sidney any share in her state confidence ; ■ him from ■ cabinet which he would have enlightened by his counsels, and purified by the example of his honour and integrity ; and devoted ■ ■ an honourable banishment, and a premature death. Such a man should have had ■ a master as Henry the Fourth of France, and ■ concord of all that was wise, and virtuous, and amiable, might have gone far towards gaining the empire of Europe, by winning the hearts of its people. But he was consigned to almost private life, and a strict observer of his ■ and heart would have been his best biographer. Most of the inestimable story which such a one might have preserved for our delight and ■ instruction is lost for ever. Sir Fulke Greville, who however entirely loved him, wanted the talent, or the feeling, or both, which might have excited and enabled him ■ record innumerable effusions of goodness, and wisdom, and genius, imbibed by himself, even at the fountain-head : but his book, which has been the chief groundwork for subsequent writers, contains ■ but ■ facts and vapid eulogium. Those who would study then with precision ■ detail of Sidney's character must seek it in his writings, and I regret ■ the proposed limits of the present publication ■ ■ allow of disquisition to that effect. I shall conclude, however, by enumerating them, adding ■ very few remarks.

We do not find that any of his works were published ■ lived. ■ Arcadia, which ■ ■ the living tongue, and so frequently reprinted, first appeared in 1591 ; as did " Astrophel and Stella," ■ long series of Sonnets and Songs, intended, as is said, to express his passion for the fair Lady Rich. "The Defence of Poesy," a critical rhapsody, full of classical intelligence and acute observation, was first printed in 1595; these only of his works were published singly. Other of his Sonnets, as "A Remedy for Love," "The Lady of May," a masque, have been subjoined to different editions of the Arcadia. In a volume published in 1600, and now lately reprinted, with the title of "England's Helicon, or a Garland of Songs," are many from his pen. His answer to that furious volume of vengeance against his uncle, well known by the title of "Leicester's Commonwealth," remained in manuscript so late as 1746, when Collins inserted it in his fine publication of the Sidney Papers. There are a few other pieces, both in verse and prose, which, having been perhaps falsely ascribed to him, I forbear to mention.

Notwithstanding all we have heard of Philip Sidney's early fondness for literature, I am inclined to think that, had he been placed in his proper sphere, we might never have known him as an author. The character of his talents, the form of his education, the habits of his early society, and his own earnest inclination, combined to qualify him for a statesman of the first order. Disappointed in his favourite views, his activity probably sought relief in literary exercise, and hence we find more of the mind than of the heart, more judgment than fancy, in the productions of his pen. He fled to the muse, perhaps, rather for refuge than enjoyment, and courted her more in the spirit of a friend than a lover; but the warmth of the attachment was sufficient to produce a flame which was always bright and pure, and which, if it did not dazzle, at least never failed to enlighten. His works in general may be characterised as the choicest fruit of universal study, and unbounded recollection, selected by a mind which while it possessed equal measures of the most powerful vigour, and the most refined delicacy, was ruled by the highest principles of religious, moral, and social duty. ■ was deficient in originality, but the splendour of his virtues and of his talents awed criticism to silence, ■ charmed ■ into unqualified approbation ; till ■ writer, confessedly ■ the head of his own most agreeable class, stood boldly forward, not to start that objection, but to deny nearly all which the united suffrages of Europe had for two centuries implicitly agreed to grant. ■ Orford, ■ his sketch of the life of Sir Fulke Greville, calls Sir Philip Sidney " an astonishing object of temporary admiration ; " discovers his Arcadia to be " a tedious, lamentable, pedantic, pastoral romance ; " and insults the sublimity of his exit by ascribing ■ ■ " the rashness of ■ volunteer." But ■ noble writer delighted in biographical paradoxes, and perhaps in controverting received opinions and high authorities. It was natural enough for the champion of Richard the Third to turn his weapons against Sir Philip Sidney, as well ■ to endeavour to pull down ■ character of Lord Falkland, from the height on which ■ ■ been placed by the glowing pen of the immortal Clarendon. But a truce with ■ specks of criticism. Let them who are able and willing to judge for themselves, turn to the Defence of Poesy for the prodigious extent and variety ■ Sidney's studies, ■ for his judicious application of the results of them : let them contemplate even in the very first pages of the Arcadia, the readiness and playfulness of his wit, and in the whole, innumerable scattered proofs of his speculative ■ practical wisdom ; let them compare his style, both ■ verse ■ prose, with those of contemporary authors ; ■ they will turn, with a sentiment almost amounting ■ anger, from a solitary judgment founded in caprice, and ■ ■ least with indiscretion.

However imprudent it may be to place in the same view with my ■ observations a passage so finely conceived, ■ so exquisitely expressed, ■ ■ conclude, without citing in justification of some of the opinions which I have presumed here to give, the words of an admirable living critic.

"Sidney," says he, in comparing his poetical talents with those of Lord Buckhurst, "displays more of the artifices, and less of the inspiration of Poetry. His command of language, and the variety of his ideas are conspicuous. His mind exhibits an astonishing fund of acquired wealth; but images themselves never seem to overcome him with all the power of actual presence. The ingenuity of his faculties supplies him with a lively substitute; but is not vivid, like the reality."

MARY STUART,

SCOTLAND.

THE writer of these memoirs having formerly been the humble instrument of discovering and promulgating many very curious particulars of Mary's eventful story, it might perhaps be expected that he should be more inclined, and even better qualified, than many others, to treat of it somewhat large; neither of those motives, however, he sensible of such, could tempt him to assume the task. All stories of history and tradition, of public records and private collections, have been already ransacked; argument and reasonable conjecture have been exhausted; the fields of imagination and fancy have been traversed in search of bright or hideous visions to enhance the charms of her person and her wit, and to aggravate the horror of her sufferings. Nay, while in the fear of saying too much he thus apologising for saying so little, appears a complete "Life of Mary, Queen of Scots," from the ever employed and instructive of George Chalmers, who has more journeyed over the whole of this interesting ground, seems to have left no stone unturned which might by possibility have concealed any novel object of his research. The whole result is surely before the public. It comprehends a tale which the heart has eagerly accepted from all passions, fixed irrevocably in the memory. To repeat would be impertinent; to enlarge it, new discoveries made, is impossible.

only object then in the few following lines is to give some account of the picture an engraving from which panies them. The portraits hitherto ascribed this Princess are as various and as dissimilar as the circumstances of her life, or the features of her character, agreeing only in the single of representing her eminently beautiful. No strong internal presumption, no inveterate tradition, tends to distinguish the authenticity of any one of them : the several professed resemblances of her countenance have excited almost as much doubt and controversy as the disputed points of her history : and a genuine likeness of this celebrated lady may be reckoned the first of elegant and tasteful desiderata of the present age. How far the beautiful specimen of two arts which is before us may tend to decide the question must rest in great measure on the degree of credit that may be esteemed due to a report which has been regularly handed down in the family of the noble owner of the picture, and which must necessarily be here prefaced by the brief recital of a small portion of Mary's history.

In the year 1567, which is well known to have been distinguished, fatally for her reputation, by the murder of her husband, and her marriage to infamous Bothwell, the most powerful among the nobility of Scotland associated for the declared purposes of separating her from that wretch, and protecting the person of the young Prince, her son. the usual fate of such combinations, they went much further : they Queen a captive ; her triumphantly through the with which they had strengthened themselves ; and, having imprisoned her closely in the Lochleven, deposed her, and crowned her son. The owner of the castle was a Douglas, nearly related to the celebrated Earl of Morton, the most considerable person of the confederates, and who had been commissioned by them to accept her surrender. she nearly twelve months. At length, after the failure of various plans to liberate her, formed by [redacted] who still remained true to her interest, [redacted] accomplished it herself, by gaining [redacted] George Douglas, brother of her keeper. On [redacted] young man, under the age of twenty, [redacted] already a slave to [redacted] beauty the magic of which [redacted] [redacted] could wholly resist, [redacted] employed [redacted] the graces of mind and [redacted] with which nature [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] so abundantly furnished her, and to leave [redacted] passion of his heart unassailed which might be rendered subservient [redacted] her view, is [redacted] [redacted] have tempted his ambition by giving [redacted] hopes [redacted] [redacted] might obtain her hand. When she [redacted] completed her charm, [redacted] besought him to aid her escape. [redacted] instantly complied, for who could have hesitated [redacted] and, by means which, however curious [redacted] interesting, it is not to the present purpose [redacted] recapitulate, restored her to freedom.

The picture which has furnished the plate before us has been preserved with the greatest care, from time immemorial, in the [redacted] of Dalmahoy, the principal [redacted] in Scotland of the Earl of Morton; on the upper part of it is inscribed, with a modesty of assertion which tends to favour the report [redacted] its originality, "Mary, Queen of Scots, said [redacted] have been painted during her confinement in Lochleven Castle;" and [redacted] noble Earl who [redacted] present possesses it, has enhanced [redacted] value [redacted] his permission to place an engraving from it among [redacted] [redacted] ornaments of this work, by condescending to [redacted] that, according to an invariable tradition in his Lordship's family, [redacted] was once the property of George Douglas, the liberator of Mary, and that it passed from him, together with other curious [redacted] of that unhappy Princess, [redacted] [redacted] eminent relation, James, fourth [redacted] of Morton, who [redacted] been [redacted] [redacted] above, in whose posterity it has remained to the present day.

From the same picture also professes to have been engraved a plate which supplies the frontispiece to the first volume [redacted] Mr. [redacted] [redacted] work, [redacted] its striking dissimilitude [redacted] the portrait here presented [redacted] [redacted] reluctant remarks on it highly necessary in this place. It is scarcely too much to say that neither the features, nor the general character of countenance, given in the two engravings, bear even the slightest resemblance to each other; and this variance between two copies taken from the same original, which is allowed to possess stronger claims to authenticity than any other painting, is the more distressing, as it was hoped that the engraving before us would have done much towards putting to rest the long-disputed question as to Mary's features, and the skill and talents of the painter who copied the original, together with the clear opinion of its correctness, after actual comparison with the painting, expressed by the noble Earl who possesses the picture, may be received as pledges for its exact fidelity. Having thus established the claim of the engraving here presented, to be considered as the genuine representation of Mary's portrait, the failure in that of Mr. Chalmers's alone remains to be accounted for.

That gentleman discloses to us in his preface a new and most extraordinary discovery by which he has been enabled, with the aid of an artist, of whom he expresses a high opinion, to produce, de novo, a correct portrait of Mary; and one of the most singular features of the invention is, that the distracting variety of those which have hitherto individually pretended to originality constitutes the very source which gives undoubted authenticity to his. Having spoken of those perplexities of which no one before had known how to take the advantage, Mr. Chalmers says: "In this state of uncertainty with regard to the person of the Scottish Queen, I employed a very ingenious artist to paint that celebrated Queen from such sketches, pictures, and other materials, as might be laid before his intelligent eyes: at the same time I presumed to think that her features might be settled by ascertaining the facts relating to her person like other matters of history." In other words, that the artist was to copy from one picture a pair of eyes, justified by the authority of Melvil ; a ~~from~~ from another, corroborated by the report ~~Keith~~ Keith ; from a coin, a smile which had been cursed by Knox ; ~~from a figure on a tomb, a frown which Buchanan had~~ recorded ~~been~~ been ~~at him ; and the like ;~~ the combination of ~~these~~ pictorial ~~historical~~ hopes were at length ~~by the acquisition~~ a portrait which, to ~~his own words,~~ his own words, "has been very generally ~~for~~ for truth and its elegance." From ~~picture was engraved the plate which~~ prefixed ~~the~~ second volume of ~~work.~~ work.

Now, to speak seriously, ~~Chalmers, whose kindness~~ candour I know too well ~~expect~~ expect ~~displeasure at~~ remarks, has left, fortunately for us, to the idle and the careless those lighter studies which employ the mind without fatigue, and gratify the fancy without informing the understanding. A votary to history, his affection for it ~~led~~ led him to give too large a credit to its descriptive powers, while a negligence of the more delicate and less important theory of the human face divine has ~~him~~ him ~~liberty to suppose~~ the impossibility, that a mere junction of features, however correctly each may have ~~individually represented and~~ copied, should produce what we commonly ~~a likeness.~~ an artist who could propose or encourage such a suggestion merits ~~so~~ a judgment.

To conclude, the fact ~~to be~~ to be that the picture which assumes ~~have been so whimsically composed (vol. ii.)~~ was ill copied from that which is stated to be a copy from the Douglas picture (vol. i.), to which it has scarcely any ~~blance~~ blance (except in the dress, in which the artist condescendingly tells us in ~~Chalmers's preface,~~ Chalmers's preface, ~~"did~~ "did ~~chuse~~ make ~~alteration"~~ alteration"), or ~~vered~~ : in short, ~~judged it necessary to produce somehow an~~ judged it necessary to produce somehow an evident agreement between the two. ~~need only be~~ that the sole view of these observations is to record a caveat against ~~inference~~ the authenticity ~~the por-~~ the portrait here presented, which might possibly be drawn from a careless comparison of it with either of the two engravings in Mr. Chalmers's history of Mary; and this is rendered the more necessary by an anticipation of the respect which will undoubtedly and justly be paid to that work. A jealousy of fair reputation, and a regard to weighty interests, equally excusable, have demanded this explanation.

ROBERT DUDLEY,

EARL OF LEICESTER.

THIS mighty Peer, whose history will remain a memorial of the injustice and the folly, as well as of the unbounded power, of his Sovereign, was the fifth son of the equally mighty, but less fortunate, John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, by Jane, daughter of Sir Henry Guldeford. His father's greatness shot forth with rapidity and splendour as a meteor, and as suddenly into darkness: his son's, planet-like, somewhat slowly, and traversed its hemisphere in a regular obedience to the power, from which it derived its motion and its brilliancy. It obeyed however no other power, for Leicester offended against all laws, both divine and human. He seems not to have possessed a single virtue, nor was he highly distinguished by the qualities of his understanding; but the unlimited favour of Elizabeth, which for many years rendered him perhaps the most powerful subject in the world, invested him with a factitious importance, while, on his part, by a degree of hypocrisy and daring it rather confounded than deceived the minds of men, he contrived to avoid open flattery. Even flattery however seems to have been ashamed to raise her voice for him while he lived, and the calm and patient research of times, and its habitual respect for the memory of the illustrious dead, has busied itself in vain to find a single bright spot on his character.

He was born in about the year 1532. His father, who surrounded the person of Edward the Sixth with his offspring, procured for him in 1551 the post of one of the six Gentlemen of the Bedchamber, and about the same time that of Master of the King's buck-hounds. Edward, with the common readiness of youth, accepted him as a familiar companion, and evinced towards him a partiality bordering on favouritism. On the discomfiture of the feeble attempt to place his sister-in-law, Jane Grey, on the Throne, and the execution of Mary, he was imprisoned in the Tower, merely, as it should seem, because he was his father's son, for history furnishes us with no trace of his active participation in that design. He was indicted, however, of high treason, and prudently pleading guilty, received sentence of death, apparently as a matter of form, and, soon after, a pardon, and was liberated on the eighteenth of October, 1554. Mary indeed immediately took him in some measure into her favour; and we find in Strype's Memorials that after her marriage to Philip he attached himself particularly to that Prince, and was chosen "to carry messages between the King and Queen, riding post on such occasions, and neglecting nothing that might ingratiate himself with either of them." It was at the intercession of Philip, as all historians agree, that such of the prisoners for Jane's forlorn cause as escaped with life were set at liberty; nor is it less certain that the rigours of Elizabeth's captivity were softened through his influence. It may be very probably conjectured, though it has hitherto escaped the observation of historical speculatists, that Dudley was the principal instrument of correspondence between the King and that Princess, and that the dawn of her enormous subsequent favour towards him may be very reasonably ascribed to the impression made on her youthful heart, in a season of danger and misfortune, by a young man who possessed every natural and artificial qualification to win feminine affection.

She appointed him, immediately on her accession, to the distinguished office of Master of the Horse, and shortly after, on the fourth of June, 1559, he was installed a Knight of the

Garter, and sworn of the Privy Council. These great preferments were presently granted by grants of an immense value, among which we find the celebrated manor and castle of Kenilworth, in Warwickshire; the Crown the sole source of the growing power and wealth, the public bodies, particularly of the ecclesiastical order, in the hope of securing to their respective interests the vast influence which he evidently possessed in the mind of the Queen, elected him to their stewardships, and other municipal offices, which, not to mention the sums which he annually derived from them, extended his authority into almost every part of the realm. That such an extravagance of good fortune should have excited envy and competition might reasonably be expected, but few ever ventured to appear in open rivalry towards him. Thomas Radclyffe, Earl of Sussex, perhaps the most virtuous and high-spirited, and certainly one of the wisest, of Elizabeth's servants, openly opposed himself from public motives to the secret design which Dudley undoubtedly entertained of becoming her husband, and was joined by Henry Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel, who had with less reserve aspired to that proud distinction: the latter submitted with despair, or sullen patience, to a power which seemed impregnable by the attacks of faction or the machinations of intrigue; even Burghley, esteemed as he was for his sagacity and probity, condescended to profess the favourite and esteem which he could not have felt. Elizabeth, as though for the express purpose of giving a colour to his arrogant view of partaking her bed, now proved to himself and to the world that she thought him worthy of a royal spouse, by proposing him in form as a husband to the Queen of Scots, by whom he knew he would be rejected. Thus he stood in the Court of his mistress, when on the twenty-eighth of September, 1564, she raised him to the dignity of Baron of Denbigh, and on the following day to the Earldom of Leicester, and towards the end of that year the University of Oxford elected him their Chancellor.

accompanied [redacted] soon after in a visit to [redacted] learned body, and was received with a respect and deference perhaps never before conceded to any of her subjects, and which [redacted] fact could not properly have been due to any one beneath the rank of her consort.

In the mean time however the Queen, by a treaty of marriage with the Archduke Charles [redacted] Austria, which bore every mark of sincerity, cast a lasting damp on his proud hopes. Leicester had [redacted] far presumed on her partiality as to oppose the negotiation, not only in argument [redacted] herself [redacted] her Council, but even publicly, and was rebuked by her with a severity which, while it convinced him of the vanity of [redacted] splendid pretensions, left him no room to doubt [redacted] self-love, and a resolution to preserve her independence, [redacted] the ruling features of her character. [redacted] disappointment was confined to the frustration of this single view, for in all other [redacted] her favour [redacted] [redacted] influence remained unimpaired; and, now at leisure to pursue a more ordinary track of ambition, he sought, with the aid of a most profound dissimulation, to maintain the possession of them: nor was this caution unnecessary, for the repulse which he had lately experienced from the Queen had disclosed to him enemies perhaps before unsuspected, and encouraged [redacted] rivals to a more open show of competition. Among the latter [redacted] Thomas Howard, fourth Duke of Norfolk, a [redacted] [redacted] only invested with [redacted] utmost importance [redacted] splendour of descent, immense wealth, and no very distant kindred to Elizabeth, could bestow, but one of the few of her subjects whom a party in her Court and Council had flattered with the hope of gaining her hand. Leicester determined [redacted] the ruin of [redacted] thus in every way hateful to him; and, as it could be accomplished only by treachery, insinuated himself [redacted] [redacted] confidence of the Duke, who was distinguished by [redacted] generosity and simplicity of his character. [redacted] communicated to him [redacted] plan which he had formed for a marriage with the Queen of Scots, with all his weighty dependencies; ■■■ directed in every step towards it by ■■■ counsel, ■■■ when it approached to fruition ■■■ betrayed by him ■ Elizabeth; who indeed it may be reasonably suspected ■■■ employed him from ■■■ beginning for that purpose.

These detestable facts have been fully proved against him; but it is to the last degree difficult, not to say impossible, such were the depth of his artifices, and the dead secrecy of ■■■ instruments, to obtain clear historical evidence of the ■■■ remarkable features of ■■■ conduct in public measures, and towards public servants. His agency ■■■ felt, but not seen; or ■ those who ■■■■ bound by his spells sometimes obtained a glimpse of the enchanter, he ■■■ presently again shrouded in utter darkness. Much, however, has been proved, and more inferred from circumstances. Having overthrown the Duke of Norfolk, he conceived about the same time a bitter hatred against the Queen of Scots, and Burghley, who ■■■■ been the intimate and confidential friend of that unfortunate nobleman. It was probably the offspring of fear, for there can be little doubt that each of them possessed damning proofs of his late treachery. The rigours of Mary's tedious captivity, the strange vacillations of Elizabeth's policy regarding her, and her tragical end, may be most reasonably ascribed to his influence over the worst passions of his infatuated mistress; yet he found ■■■■ to impress on ■■■ mind of Mary a persuasion that he commiserated her sufferings, and she more than ■■■■ appealed to his pity. ■■■ reiterated insinuations against Cecil were, however, always unsuccessful. Elizabeth regarded that great minister with feelings directly opposite to those of fear and anger, and all her selfishness was awakened to protect him. Leicester ■■■ length ventured to quit for a moment the stronghold of ■■■ accustomed obscurity, and allowed the faction of which he ■■■ the acknowledged head to frame a regular accusation of Burghley to the Privy Council, but the plan ■■■ discovered to the Queen before it ■■■ fully matured, and the favourite ■■■ once more reprimanded by her.

Original [redacted] from [redacted] to the Treasurer, written in [redacted] precise period, stuffed with [redacted] most fulsome flattery, and professions of the warmest friendship, are still extant.

He is said to have appeased his vengeance by the sacrifice of [redacted] Nicholas Throgmorton, a bold and busy politician, who, after having been deeply concerned in the negotiations between Mary and the Duke of Norfolk, unexpectedly quitted Leicester's party, and attached himself to Burghley. He died very suddenly in [redacted] Earl's house, as it [redacted] industriously reported, of a pleurisy, after partaking of a supper to which Leicester had invited him, but little doubt [redacted] entertained that [redacted] had been taken off by poison, and [redacted] malice with [redacted] [redacted] favourite presently afterwards pursued his family almost established the fact. That Leicester dealt in that horrible method of assassination cannot be reasonably controverted, however we may be inclined to question some particular charges of that nature among the many which have been made against him. The honourable and amiable Walter Devereux, [redacted] of Essex, to whom, both for public and private causes, he was a determined enemy, and whose gallant [redacted] vices in Ireland he had cruelly thwarted and depreciated, perished in [redacted] country with a clear impression [redacted] mind, corroborated by the opinion of all who happened to be then about him, that his death had been so procured. The Countess of Lennox, (the mode of whose royal descent presented an [redacted] [redacted] the possible inheritance of [redacted] Crown, derived from George Duke of Clarence, by Leicester's kinsman and favourite the Earl of Huntingdon, a speculation which he much cherished,) died, with strong symptoms of poison, presently after having received a visit from him. Nay, it has been generally reported, though probably untrue, that he retained in his establishment two persons, an Italian and a Jew, who were adepts in the diabolical art of preparing the means for such sacrifices; but the very exaggerations of the general charge on his memory tend to prove that it must have been in some degree well founded.

Yet this iniquitous man, not less odious in his private life, as we shall presently see, [redacted] disgraceful to the Queen and her Court ; an enemy and torment to her ministers ; the prime patron of the Puritans, whom she secretly regarded perhaps with [redacted] [redacted] than the Papists ; not only maintained [redacted] ground, but gradually [redacted] in the estimation of [redacted] [redacted] the last hour of his life. She seemed [redacted] anxious to publish [redacted] [redacted] world [redacted] distinction in which she held him. Her [redacted] [redacted] to [redacted] [redacted] his mansion of Kenilworth, [redacted] July 1575, was protracted [redacted] the length of nineteen days, an honour never [redacted] any other occasion granted by her [redacted] a subject. In [redacted] 1577, [redacted] [redacted] forgot herself as [redacted] write thus [redacted] [redacted] and Countess of Shrewsbury—"Our very good cousins—Being given to understand from our cousin of Leicester how honourably he [redacted] not only lately received by you, [redacted] cousin the Countess, at Chatworth, and his diet by you both discharged [redacted] Buxtona, but also presented with [redacted] very rare present, [redacted] should do him great wrong, holding him in that place of favour [redacted] do, in case we should not let you understand in how thankful sort we accept the same at both your hands, not as done unto him but to [redacted] own self, reputing him as another self ; and therefore ye may [redacted] yourselves that we, taking upon [redacted] the debt not [redacted] his but [redacted] own, will take [redacted] accordingly to discharge the [redacted] in such honourable sort [redacted] [redacted] well deserving creditors [redacted] ye shall [redacted] have [redacted] to think ye have met with [redacted] ungrateful debtor." Numerous instances of [redacted] extravagant folly might be cited, and indeed Leicester's arrogance and presumption under such temptations [redacted] [redacted] most defensible part of his character. [redacted] degrading exposure of her motive, however, was yet to come—at this period he once more asked her hand, and was once more refused. Enraged [redacted] [redacted] disappointment, [redacted] instantly married, without making any [redacted] munication [redacted] her of [redacted] intention ; and Elizabeth, in utter contempt not only of the delicacy of her [redacted] and the dignity of her station, but of all principles [redacted] law [redacted] justice which could bear any relation to the case, tore him from the arms of his bride, and imprisoned him in a little fortress which then stood in the park at Greenwich. This transport of angry jealousy, however, soon subsided. Leicester was released, and restored to royal favour, and is said to have consoled himself for his disgrace with schemes for the assassination of Simier, an agent from the Duke of Anjou, who was then in London, negotiating for the projected marriage of that Prince to Elizabeth, and whom he suspected to have apprised her of his own secret nuptials.

The treaty, which had been for a while suspended, was renewed in 1581, when a more honourable embassy arrived from the French Court, and Leicester, who had now thought fit to assume the character of an advocate for the proposed union, was named among those who were appointed to confer with the commissioners. Anjou soon followed; but the strange caprice of Elizabeth on this occasion, which forms a remarkable and well known feature in the history of the time, finally disgusted him so highly, that, after three months' residence in her court, he suddenly embarked in the beginning of the succeeding year, for the Low Countries, the government of which he had lately accepted. She indulged Leicester with the triumph of conveying thither his illustrious and rejected rival, and on his visit he probably laid the groundwork for that proud appointment to which, by the joint act of herself and those States, he was soon after nominated. He returned to a Court and Council agitated by the discovery of the designs lately projected by the friends of the unhappy Mary, and yet more by doubts and suspicions. He seized the opportunity of displaying his loyalty, and of indulging his hatred of the royal prisoner, by proposing to the nobility and gentry a bond of association by which they should bind themselves to pursue, even unto death, those who might form any plan against the life, the crown, the dignity, of Elizabeth. Mary was in fact the secret object of this widely-extended menace, but the terror which it inspired having for a time paralysed the efforts of her adherents, he became impatient of her existence, and boldly moved ■■■ Queen that she should be taken off by poison. Elizabeth, nothing loth, undoubtedly proposed it to her ministers, for it ■■■ historically proved that Walsingham, practised and ■■■■ hackneyed ■■■ he ■■■■ in a sort of treachery legalised by the ■■■■ necessity of States, protested against ■■■ heinous a measure, and insisted that she should not be put to death without ■■■ least the forms of judicial inquiry.

It ■■■■ just ■■■ this period that a deadly invective, under the title of "Leicester's Commonwealth," ■■■ at least ■■■ entitled in subsequent editions, issued from the press in Flanders, and was presently dispersed in vast abundance throughout England, and indeed in most of the nations of Europe. It consisted of a circumstantial relation of all the crimes and faults which had been at any time laid to the charge of the favourite, delivered with the utmost artifice of affected ■■■■ dour and simplicity, and intermixed with political reflections, tending to prove that every ■■■■ of complaint which existed in England might be traced to his malign influence. No publication ever before obtained so sudden and extensive ■■■ circulation. It ■■■■ read with the utmost avidity; and the ridiculous efforts for its suppression made by Elizabeth, whose policy where Leicester was concerned always ■■■■ way to her passions, served but to excite to the highest pitch ■■■■ curiosity of her subjects. She compelled her Council to address letters to the lieutenants of counties, ■■■■ other public functionaries, charging them to prohibit the perusal of the pamphlet, and to punish severely the dispersers of it; and, not content with ■■■■ degree of folly, made them insert a declaration (to ■■■■ their own words) that "her Majesty testified in her conscience before God that she knew in assured certainty the books and ■■■■ published against the Earl to ■■■ most scandalous, and such as none but ■■■ incarnate devil himself could dream to be true." Her subservient Council, ■■■■ of the members of which utterly detested him, outran mistress in vehement assertions which they knew false, and of the truth which, had they been otherwise than false, no evidence could possibly been obtained. There indeed little reason to doubt the allegations of this celebrated libel. Philip Sidney, who was Leicester's nephew, sat down, in all the pride and heat of youth, and full consciousness of talent, to them, almost wholly failed. Despairing success, perhaps length deterred from attempting in such a work by that fine moral feeling which distinguished him, he laid his work aside, after considerable progress, the fruit of which remained unpublished till the appearance, of late years, of the Sidney Papers.

In the following year, 1585, the United Provinces, yet unable to establish their independence, reiterated a request formerly made to Elizabeth, to become their sovereign. Anxious to avoid jealous imputation of an ambitious desire of extending her dominion to curb the power of Spain, and to the Protestant cause, refused the offer, but readily agreed to furnish them with a powerful aid of troops and money. Leicester solicited, and instantly obtained, the command of this expedition, and received, on his landing at Flushing, of which nephew Sidney had been previously appointed Governor, with the respect due to a Viceroy, which character, in contradiction to his instructions, he instantly assumed. The States, eager to persuade Philip the Second that Elizabeth exercised a virtual sovereignty over them, invested the by a solemn with authority, which he readily accepted, and, amidst the gorgeous festivities prepared to celebrate his exaltation, letters arrived from her, both himself and to the States, in a tone of unexampled fury.—“I thought,” said Leicester, “that one whom I raised of dust, and prosecuted with such singular favour above others, would with so great tempt have alighted and our commands a matter

so great consequence, and so highly concerning our honour," &c. This was worthy of the daughter of Henry Eighth, but the weakness of Elizabeth presently succeeded. Leicester returned a submissive explanation, and was instantly restored to favour, does it appear even that his appointment which had produced this ebullition of capricious wrath was revoked. His service, however, in the Low Countries was marked by misfortune and disgrace. Totally deficient in military experience, he found himself opposed to the Prince of Parma, one of the first generals of his age, and a politician also of no small fame; his admirable nephew, whose advice had aided him in the council, and whose example had invigorated him in the field, fell a sacrifice to the intemperance of his valour before the walls of Zutphen. The States became envious of his authority, and thwarted the measures of his government, already weak and inefficient, and he increased their jealousy by striving to ingratiate himself with the people. He returned to England, disgusted but unwillingly; the faction which he had formed prevailed on the States again to solicit his presence, and on the twenty-fifth of June, 1587, he landed in Zealand, with new levies. Fresh discords however arising, Elizabeth, with his concurrence, finally recalled him in the succeeding November, and shielded him by her authority against a regular charge of mal-administration in the Low Countries, which had been prepared before his arrival, but was preferred to the Privy Council by a party of his enemies, headed by the Lord Buckhurst, whom the Queen had lately sent thither to learn the true state of affairs, and who was rewarded for his pains by a vote of censure and imprisonment of several months.

Leicester had now reached the highest pinnacle of favour and power. Elizabeth could refuse him nothing, and her ministers, Burghley himself, seem to have trembled at his nod. All the most important commands, civil and military, in the nation, were in the hands of his relations or friends ; to the offices already held by himself ■■■ very lately ■■■■ those of Steward of her Household and ■■■ Justice of the forests south ■ Trent ; and in ■■■ 1588, placed him ■ the head of the army which she had raised to resist the expected Spanish invasion. She thus concluded her speech to ■■■ troops, when she reviewed them at Tilbury—"Rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms ; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already by your forwardness ■■■ you have deserved rewards and crowns ; and I do assure you, on the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you. In the meantime, my lieutenant general shall be in my stead, than whom ■■■ prince commanded a ■■■ noble and worthy subject." In this moment, such is the insatiable thirst of ambition, he solicited Elizabeth to appoint him to the office, not ■■■ unusual than enormously powerful and dignified, of Lieutenant, or Vicegerent, of her kingdoms of England and Ireland, ■■■ even this, tenacious ■ she was of her royal authority, she readily conceded to him. It is said that a patent for this mighty appointment was ready for the Great Seal, when Burghley, and her Chancellor Hatton, ventured to ■■■■ strate with her, and so far succeeded as ■ obtain leave to suspend for ■■■ days that gratification. In the meantime Leicester left London for a short sojournment ■ Kenilworth Castle, and ■ his way thither stopped at his house of Cornbury, in Oxfordshire, where he ■■ seized by a rapid fever, and expired on ■■ fourth of September, ■■■■

From the foregoing sketch I have hitherto excluded any particulars of the domestic life of this ■■■ remarkable person. They will be found, singularly enough, considering the ■■■ of ■ character, to ■■■■ concerned with his public story, the chain of which they would therefore but have served to disconnect. ■ parts of his conduct, however, morally viewed, were in ■■■■ harmony, for the man was ■ abominably wicked ■ the ■■■■ and courtier.

Leicester, at the age of eighteen, married Anne, an Amy, daughter and heir of Sir John Robsart, a gentleman of Norfolk, distinguished by antiquity, indeed splendour, of descent, and by his great possessions in that county. They were wedded, as Edward the Sixth, whose presence the nuptials were solemnised, states in his journal, on the fourth of June, 1550, and lived together, with what degree of cordiality we are not informed, for ten years, but had no children. It is scarcely to be doubted that he caused this lady to be assassinated, and the circumstances of the time, as well as of the deed itself, tend to press on his memory this dreadful charge perhaps more heavily than any other of the same character. Her death occurred on the eighth of September, 1560, at the very period when the lofty hope of obtaining the hand of his sovereign may be clearly presumed to have reigned with the strongest sway in his overheated mind. He sent her, with what avowed motives does not appear, to the solitary manor-house of Cumnor, in Berkshire, a village not far from Oxford, inhabited by one of his train, named Anthony Forster. Thither she was shortly followed by Sir Richard Verney, another of his retainers, and a few days after, those persons having sent all her servants to Abingdon Fair, and no one being with her but themselves, she died in consequence, as they reported, of a fall down a staircase. But "the inhabitants of Cumnor," says Aubrey, in whose history of Berkshire all that could be collected on the subject is minutely detailed, "will tell you there that she was conveyed from her usual chamber where she lay to another, where the bod's head of the chamber stood close to a privy postern door, where they in the night came, and stifled her in her blood; bruised her head very much; broke her neck; and at length flung her down stairs; thereby believing the world would have thought it a mischance, and so have blinded their villainy." Nor was this plan of violence adopted after they had vainly attempted to destroy her by poison, through the unconscious aid of Dr. Bailey, then professor of physic in the University

■ Oxford, who had resisted their earnest importunity to make a medicine for her, when he knew she was in perfect health, suspecting, from his observation of circumstances, as he afterwards declared, that they intended to add to it ■■■■ deadly drug, and trembling for his ■■■■ safety. The disfigured corpse was hurried to the earth without a coroner's inquest; and to such a height ■■■■ the pity and resentment of the neighbouring families arose, that they employed the pen of Thomas Lever, a prebendary of Coventry, to write to the Secretaries of State, intreating that a strict inquiry should be made into the true cause of the lady's death, but the application had no effect. The strongest inference, however, ■■■■ Leicester's guilt in this case is to be drawn from a string of reasons, noted down by Cecil himself, why the Queen should not make him her husband, one of which is—"that he is infamed by the death of his wife."—The effect of such a remark, made by such a person, and for such a purpose, wants little of the force of positive evidence.

The relaxations of such a man as Leicester ■■■■ commonly sought in the gratification of mere appetite, ■■■■ such were his. After a variety of amorous intrigues, not worthy ■■■■ recollection, ■■■■ became ■■■■ ■■■■ usually attached to Douglas, daughter of William Howard first Lord Effingham, and widow of John, Lord Sheffield. Vulgar report, presuming on the known enormities of his life, proclaimed that he had disposed of her husband by those infernal secret means, so frequently ascribed to him in other cases. Be this as ■■■■ might, ■■■■ is certain that he married her, or deceived her into a pretended marriage, immediately after the death of Lord Sheffield. By this lady he had a son, with whose future story, remarkable as it was rendered by the dispositions unhappily and infamously made by the father, this memoir has no concern, and a daughter. He stipulated with the unfortunate Douglas that their marriage should be kept profoundly secret; the children were debarred from any intercourse with their mother; ■■■■ the Earl, having some years after determined to marry another, compelled her by threats, by promises, at length, by attempts on her life, to make a most effectual, though tacit renunciation of her claims on him, by publicly taking her husband Sir Edward Stafford. These circumstances disclosed, shortly before the death of Elizabeth, in the prosecution of a suit in the Star Chamber, instituted to establish the legitimacy, and consequent right of inheritance, of her son; and on this occasion Douglas, after having proved by the testimony of many respectable witnesses her marriage to the deceased Earl, declared an oath the foul proceedings by which she had been forced to throw herself into the arms and on the protection of Stafford; concluding with a relation of the which Leicester previously used to her by poison, under the operation of which she that her hair and her nails fallen off; that her constitution had ruined; that she narrowly escaped with life.

The object for whom this miserable lady Lettice, daughter of Knollys, and relict of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex. The already strong suspicion that Leicester had caused by diabolical means the death of that nobleman, to which some slight allusion has already been made, aggravated to the utmost by the indecent haste with which he wedded the widow, with whom there no doubt that he had for time before maintained a guilty intercourse. the marriage which so highly excited the displeasure of Elizabeth, and which she unremittingly resented towards the Countess by insulting neglect, in spite of all the instances of the young Essex, her son, who succeeded his uncle in the Queen's extravagant favour. Leicester had by this lady, one son, Robert; who in childhood four years before his father. survived the for nearly half a century; persecuted with tedious and ruinous suits by Lady Sheffield, whose legitimacy Leicester, with a folly equal in injustice, sometimes affirmed and sometimes denied, and to whom bequeathed his princely castle and domain of Kenilworth, which the unfortunate gentleman was lost in a manner defrauded by the Crown the succeeding reign.

Such, on the whole, was Elizabeth's distinguished favourite. History, to its discredit, invariably asserts, in the same breath, his wickedness and the wisdom of his royal patroness—one or the other of those assertions be false.

AMBROSE DUDLEY,

KARL ■■■ WARWICK.

EMINENCE of consanguinity, rather than any special merit ■■ fame of his own, beyond the quiet and unassuming recommendation of ■■ unblemished moral character, has preserved the memory of this nobleman from ■ neglect perhaps approaching to oblivion. A son, and at length heir, of the mighty Duke of Northumberland; a brother of that paragon of royal favour and of wickedness, Leicester, and of the innocent and ill-fated ■■■■ of Jane Grey; claimed, ■■ it were, in their right some degree of distinction, and history has probably preserved all that could have been collected of his story. He ■■■ the fourth, but at length oldest surviving ■■ of his father, by Jane, daughter of Sir Henry Galdesford, and ■■■■ born in the year 1530, or 1531.

He is said to have manifested at an early age a passion for military fame. It is certain that he ■■■ in the expedition commanded by his father in ■■■■ against the Norfolk rebels, ■■■ not improbable that he owed the honour of knighthood, which he received ■■ the seventeenth of November in that year, to some instances of that wild gallantry which in those days ■■■ esteemed the prime qualification for ■ soldier. He returned to the insipid ■■ of ■ courtier, and we hear of him only ■■ ■ partaker in ■■■■■■ and banquets till the ■■■■ ■ the Duke, ■■ father, with whom of course he had engaged in the support ■ Jane Grey's weak and unwilling pretensions to the Crown ■ July 1553. He ■■■ attained, and received sentence of death, together with his brothers, John, Robert, ■■■ Henry, and they ■■■■ confined in the Tower of London ■■■ the eighteenth of October in the succeeding year, when Mary granted ■■■ a pardon for life, permitted him ■ come to Court, and received him ■■■ some degree of favour. Philip, her consort, for reasons not clearly assigned, became the patron of the crest-fallen remains of the House of Dudley. Ambrose volunteered into the Spanish army, in ■■■ Low Countries, ■■■ distinguished himself in the ■■■■ of ■■■■ in the celebrated battle of ■■■ Quintin, ■■■ and ■■■ younger brother, Henry, who accompanied him in the same character, fell during the siege of that place. Mary, at the King's intercession, now dispelled the cloud in which the extravagant ambition of Northumberland had involved his progeny, and in the conclusion of that year, this young nobleman, together with his surviving brother Robert, afterwards Earl of Leicester, were fully restored by an act of Parliament.

The stupendous influence of ■■■ brother, which marked even the commencement of the reign of Elizabeth, presently secured a large share of her favour to Ambrose. He obtained a royal grant of estates in Leicestershire in her first year, and in the next she appointed him Master of the Ordnance for life. These boons ■■■■ presently followed by ■■■ restoration ■■■■ of his father's dignity; ■■■ the twenty-fifth ■■■ December, 1561, he was created Baron of Kington Lisle in ■■■ county of Berks, ■■■ on the following day Earl of Warwick. ■■■ was just ■■■ period that the great contest began in France between ■■■ Papists and the Huguenots which afterwards obtained the denomination of the War of ■■■ League. ■■■ reformers ■■■■ the aid of Elizabeth, and offered to place in her hands one of the most considerable ports in Normandy, which they besought her to garrison with English troops. ■■■ consented, not only readily ■■■ eagerly, ■■■ Havre ■■■ Grace, generally called Newhaven by ■■■ historical writers of ■■■ time, ■■■ given up to her;

Warwick was nominated to the command, with the title of the Queen's Lieutenant in the province; and on the twenty-second of October, 1562, arrived at Havre, with three thousand soldiers, and was met with much ceremony into office.

In the command, the only arduous public service in which he engaged him, his conduct, equally distinguished by fidelity, prudence, and courage, amply proved his ability in all the important military undertakings. The effects of his vigilance and activity were felt in every part of Normandy, from whence, by the aid of repeated excursions from his stronghold, he enabled the Protestants almost wholly to expel their enemies, when he found himself suddenly abandoned by them, and discovered that they had treacherously agreed on certain terms with the Leaguers, and even engaged themselves to turn their arms against him. He now shut himself up in his garrison, having previously dismissed the French of both persuasions, and was presently invested by a powerful army, under the command of the Constable de Montmorency. Terrible hardships and calamities ensued. The spring and summer passed almost without rain; the French cut the aqueducts which supplied the town; and the soldiers were obliged to boil their miserable sustenance in sea-water, which was frequently too their only beverage. An epidemic distemper, which carried off great numbers, succeeded. At length Warwick, after having sustained with unperceivable perseverance a siege not less obstinate than his defence, surrendered in the autumn of 1563, but not till he had received the Queen's especial command, and obtained a full and honourable capitulation. During the treaty, having appeared without his armour on the ramparts to speak to a distinguished French officer, a villain shot him from beneath, and wounded him in the leg with a poisoned bullet, a misfortune the consequences of which during the remainder of his life probably rendered retirement almost necessary to him, and prevented his accepting favours and distinctions which he so well to have merited. He was elected a

Knight of ■■■ Garter ■■ 1562, and invested ■■ Havre with ■■ ensigns of ■■ Order.

In 1568 ■■ ■■ appointed one of the commissioners ■■ inquiry into the great matter of ■■ Queen of Scots, ■■ her arrival in England; in 1569, ■■ ■■ occasion of the rebellion of the ■■ of Northumberland and Westmoreland, ■■ and the Lord Clinton ■■ appointed, jointly ■■ severally, the Queen's Lieutenants in ■■ north, ■■ the suppression of it was chiefly owing to his care and vigilance; and in ■■ succeeding year Elizabeth conferred on him the dignified office, or rather title, of Chief Butler of England. In 1570 he ■■ ■■ of the Privy Council, ■■ included in the number of Peers appointed by the royal commission for the trial of the Duke of Norfolk; and this, with the exception of his having been similarly employed ■■ the trial, ■■ it was called, of the Queen of Scots, is the last notice to be found of ■■ interference in any matter of the State. After the conclusion of the sitting, Mary addressed herself to him ■■ to one for whom she felt a regard, and in whom she placed some confidence. Of Elizabeth's ■■ for him, or of her inclination at least ■■ persuade him how highly she esteemed him, ■■ fair judgment may be formed from the following postscript, in her own handwriting to ■■ letter from her Privy Council, written to him during the siege of Havre.

" My dear Warwick,

" If your honour and my desire could accord with the loss of the needfullest finger I keep, ■■ ■■ help me ■■ my utmost need as I would gladly lose that one joint for your ■■ abode with me; but since I cannot that I would, I will do that I may; and will rather drink in ■■ ashen cup, than you ■■ your's should not be succoured both by sea and land, yea, and that with all speed possible; and let this my scribbling ■■ witness it unto them all.

" Yours, ■■ my own,

" E. R."

Warwick ■ said to have understood and patronised the commercial and manufacturing interests of ■ country. Certain it is that he was much engaged in a design projected by some London merchants for opening the trade to Barbary, which ■ length proved unsuccessful; ■ ■ in 1583 he obtained from the Queen ■ exclusive license for two years for the exporting woollen cloths thither by some ■ them ■ ■ suffered ■ heaviest losses; but no farther inference can be drawn ■ ■ circumstances than that he ■ ■ a party in their speculations, a condescension by ■ means ■ among ■ nobility towards the conclusion of ■ reign of ■ ■ Of the fact that he was a person of most unblemished conduct both in public and private life, there ■ be ■ possible doubt. ■ character stands wholly unimpeached; ■ in that volume of virulent censure on the rest of his family, known by the title of "Leicester's Commonwealth," his name ■ never mentioned disrespectfully: in the few notices of him with which history furnishes us it is always accompanied by praise, and his popular appellation ■ "the good Earl of Warwick." Towards the conclusion of his life the misery of the incurable wound which he had received at Havre gradually increased, and at length became intolerable, ■ threatened mortification. In an unsigned letter ■ George, sixth ■ of Shrewsbury, of ■ fourth of February, 1588-90, the writer says—"My Lo. of Warwick is like to go. His offices are already nere bestowed. Grafton" (doubtless ■ royal honour ■ Grafton which we ■ not elsewhere informed was ■ by him) "upon the Lo. Chancellor; Butlerage, ■ ■ Lo. of Buckehurst; ■ the M^{ship} of the Ordynance ■ Lorde Graye and Sir John Parratt stryve." Mr. Thomas Markham, in a detail of court news to the same nobleman of the seventeenth of that month writes—"On Wednesdaye was sennight, as I am ■ your L. hath hard, ■ Lord ■ Warwyk had ■ leg cutt off, since ■ tyme he ■ amendid, but not so faste as I woldd wyshe." On the twentieth he expired at the house of his brother-in-law, the Earl of Bedford, in Bloomsbury, and was buried at Warwick, where a curious altar tomb was erected to his memory by his widow.

This nobleman was thrice married; first to Anne, daughter and heir of William Whorwood, Attorney General in the reign of Henry the Eighth, by whom he had his only child, John, who died an infant before 1552. His second lady was Elisabeth daughter of Sir Gilbert Talboys, and sister and sole heir to George, last Lord Talboys. He married, thirdly, Anne, daughter of Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford.

SIR FRANCIS WALSINGHAM.

FRANCIS WALSINGHAM.

THE life of Walsingham, reputed one of the great statesmen of his time, affords but scanty materials to the biographer. Continually devoted, from an early age, to public affairs, the character of the man was almost absorbed in that of the minister; while, on the other hand, the mysterious secrecy with which he moved, invisibly as it were, in the service of the State, conceals from us most of the particulars of his great life, which we know he exercised. It may be fairly said of him, without either compliment or insult to his memory, that he was an illustrious spy; but it must be added, that he is said to have been in private life an honest and kind-hearted man. He certainly was a wise and faithful public servant.

He descended from a very ancient and respectable family in Norfolk, which he have derived its name from the town of Walsingham, a junior branch of which migrated into Kent about the time of Henry the Sixth, and was the third and youngest son of William Walsingham, of Scadbury, in the parish of Chislehurst, by Joyce, daughter of Edmund Denny, of Cheshunt, Hertfordshire. He was bred in his father's house, under a private tutor, and afterwards resided for a time in King's College, in Cambridge, from whence he went, very young, to seek an enlarged education on the continent. His persecution by Mary induced him to remain abroad till her death, when his family were zealous Protestants, and he was earnestly attached to that persuasion.

He had thus abundant leisure for the employment of a most [redacted] mind, naturally, if it may be [redacted] said, directed to [redacted] observation of the characters of nations and of individuals, of courts and of councils, of manners, customs, and political systems. [redacted] returned therefore, soon after the [redacted] of Elizabeth, a self-made statesman, with the additional advantage of a perfect knowledge of most of the European languages for he had always [redacted] reputation of being the first linguist of his time. Thus qualified, he fell in the way of Secretary Cecil, [redacted] celebrated Lord Burghley, who, presently discerning the true character of his talents, retained him with eagerness, and made him, almost immediately, a principal agent in such affairs as peculiarly required activity and secrecy. Thus [redacted] management of [redacted] concerns at the court of France was implicitly committed to [redacted] charge, [redacted] a time when they required the most refined diplomatic skill; while a dreadful civil war was raging in that country, and its Cabinet distinguished by a policy equally acute and perfidious.

Having remained there [redacted] years, he returned, for a short time, to [redacted] the deliberations of [redacted] ministers on the great question of the French marriage, to which he seems to have been then really inclined; and in August, 1570, was [redacted] again to Paris, professedly [redacted] negotiate on that subject, but, in fact, rather to agitate [redacted] of [redacted] highest importance. A very fine collection of his despatches during that mission fell into the hands of Sir Dudley Digges, and were published in 1655, under the title of "The Compleat Ambassador." These [redacted] exhibit the perhaps unparalleled combination in one and the same mind of [redacted] enlarged understanding and the minutest cunning. Such were his wisdom and his address, that he contrived, while he treated of a proposal which might seem to have no chance of success but in mutual good faith, and perfect amity, [redacted] embarrass [redacted] [redacted] the [redacted] by fomenting [redacted] insurrection of the Huguenots; to thwart [redacted] great designs of the House of Austria, by laying the foundation of the war in the Low Countries; and, after having passed three years in the prosecution of these opposite plans, he leaves an honourable character behind him in a court whose favourite interests he had constantly and successfully endeavoured to injure. He returned in April, 1573, and was received by Elizabeth with the highest respect and approbation.

Very shortly after his arrival, he was nominated one of the principal Secretaries of State. Gilbert Lord Boleyn, his father, George, Lord of Shrewsbury, on the eleventh of May, 1573, "Mr. Walsingham on that day came hither to the Court: it is thought he should be made Secretary: Sir Thomas Smythe and he, both together, should exercise that office." They were accordingly appointed; but the superintendence of all matters of extraordinary delicacy and secrecy in their department was committed to Walsingham alone, and he was to have referred them to one principle of management. Espionage, a word which is almost English, for which our language affords no synonyme, had been reduced by him to a system of precise regularity. Lloyd, making a nice distinction, estimates the number of persons employed by him in foreign courts to have been fifty-three agents, and eighteen spies. "He was a wonderful art," says the author of the Life of Lord Bolingbroke, almost copying after the same Lloyd without acknowledging the obligation, "at weaving plots which busy people were so entangled that they could never unravel; sometimes spared upon submission, sometimes hanged for examples." Lloyd, again, tells us that he would "cherish a plot for many years together; admitting the conspirators to his and the Queen's presence familiarly, but dogging them out watchfully;" and that "his spies waited on some men every hour for three years."

In 1578, he was sent to the Netherlands, accompanied by Lord Cobham, to treat, with little suc-

cerity, of a peace between the new republic and the King of Spain; and in 1581 was again appointed ambassador to the court of France. The Duke of Anjou, since the accession of his brother, Henry the Third, had renewed with earnestness his solicitations for the hand of Elizabeth, who, on her part, from a policy which has never been clearly understood, or from a caprice yet more unaccountable, had met his advances with a warmth and freedom ill suited to the dignity of an independent Queen, or to the prudence of a woman in the age of forty-five. The Duke had been thus tempted to visit her court, in the declared character of a lover; had been received by her with unbecoming tokens of affection; and soon after repelled with coldness and disdain. The professed object of Walsingham's mission was to negotiate, previously to the proposed marriage, an offensive and defensive league, but the real view was either to reconcile the contrarieties, or to involve them in deeper mystery. He was despatched, in 1583, on an embassy, equally faithless, to the young King of Scotland, afterwards our James the First. Sir James Melvil, a plain honest man, who was naturally prejudiced in Walsingham's favour, as well because they had been acquainted, as because they travelled together, in their youth, as that one part of the Secretary's instructions was to detach the King from a party which Melvil disliked, gives a large and remarkable account in his Memoirs of this minister's intercourse with James. "His Majesty," says Melvil, "appointed four of the Council, and himself, to reason with Sir Francis, and to sound what he would be at; but he refused to deal with any but with his Majesty, who heard him again." He flattered James's vanity with the highest praise of his wisdom and erudition, and fully persuaded Melvil that he had visited Scotland with the purest intention of serving that Prince. "The King marvelled," concludes Sir James, "that the Chief Secretary of England, burthened with so many great affairs, sickly, and aged, should have enterprised so painful a voyage without any purpose; for it could not be perceived what was his errand, knew only that he was in the Majesty's good counsel." It is surprising that Walsingham should have failed to accomplish the object of his embassy, inasmuch as he was to contend, not with politics, but with passions. His secret instructions doubtless were to detach James from his favourite, the Earl of Arran; to place him again in the hands of the very noblemen who had just before held him in a degrading captivity, and even forfeited his life, in this mysterious outrage distinguished in English history by the name of the "Ruthven." Elizabeth's participation in which was more unsuspected.

He returned, from thus attempting to cajole the son, to take a frightful share in the odious business of Elizabeth against the mother. Patriotism and loyalty, however enthusiastic, could furnish no apology for the fraud and treachery with which he surrounded the unhappy Mary in her prison. The exquisite refinement, and endless variety, of his designs to entrap her, savoured more of a natural talent for deception than of zeal for the public service. He was indeed in many instances to have purposely delayed the fruition of his artifices, for the delight of changing and repeating them. In the remarkable case of what is usually called "Babington's Conspiracy," Ballard, a priest, who was the original author of the design, was continually attended, from the very dawn of it, by Maude, one of Walsingham's spies. Ballard first affected to aid him in England; then passed on with him into France, to tamper with the Spanish Ambassador, and others, and returned with him; was largely in debauching Babington, and several other young men of good families, in constructing the whole machinery of the plot, in intelligence always with his master. In the meantime, another, Thomas Giffard, insinuated himself into the society of some who were in the confidence of the Queen of Scots, and undertook to manage a correspondence between her and the conspirators, in which every letter written by her, as well as their answers, were delivered first to Walsingham, by whom they were opened, deciphered, copied, re-sealed, and forged, additions occasionally made to them, and then despatched to their several destinations. Walsingham ■ length condescended to become intimate with Babington, purposely to prostitute his own personal agency in this base tragedy; and, having occupied himself for six months in drawing his net every hour nearer and nearer to the unsuspecting victims, was ■ last compelled to close ■ over them by positive orders from Elizabeth, dictated by her fears. "Thus far," says Camden, who gives a most interesting and circumstantial detail of the whole, "had Walsingham spun the thread alone, without acquainting the rest of the Queen's Council; and longer would he have drawn it, but the Queen would not suffer it, lest, as she said herself, by not heeding and preventing the danger while she might, she might seem rather to tempt God than to trust in God."

But a charge of a blacker nature rests heavily on the memory of Walsingham. In a long letter in the Harleian Collection, addressed by him and his co-secretary, Davison, within the period of which I have just now spoken, to Sir Amias Powlett, and Sir Drue Drury, by whom Mary ■■■ held in close custody, are ■■■■ terrific passages—"We find by speech lately uttered by her Majesty, that ■■■ doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for her service that she looketh for ■ your hands, in that you have not in ■ this time, of yourselves, without other provocation, found ■ some way to shorten the " * * * * * that Queen, considering the great peril she is hourly subject to so long as the said Queen shall live; wherein, besides a kind of lack of love to her, she noteth greatly that you have not that care of your own particular safeties, or rather of the preservation of religion, and the public good and prosperity of your country, that reason and policy commandeth; especially having so good a warrant and ground for the satisfaction of your consciences towards God, and the discharge of your credit and reputation towards the world, as the oath the association, which you both have so solemnly taken and vowed ; especially the matter wherewith she standeth charged being clearly manifestly proved against her. And therefore unkindly that men professing that love towards her that you do, should in a kind of sort, for of the discharge of your duty, cast the burthen upon her, knowing, as you do, her indisposition shed blood, especially of one of that and quality, and so near to her in blood as the Queen is. These respects we do greatly trouble her Majesty, who we you hath sundry times protested that, the regard of the danger of her good subjects, and faithful servants, not her own peril, she would never be drawn to assent to the shedding of her blood, &c."

Great pains have been taken to discredit the authenticity of this letter, but it is conceive with what view such a document could have been forged ; for the character of Elizabeth, who after publicly stained herself with the blood of that miserable Princess, could scarcely have suffered further deterioration by such a charge. Besides, were it proper to argue the point in place, evidence nearly positive might be produced that Elizabeth had other times given private orders that she should be put death, in the event of certain circumstances ; but have here no business with letter, except an additional proof of Walsingham's habitual abandonment every principle of justice, humanity, honour, the will a sanguinary tyrant. Mary, on her trial, challenged him her bitterest and most treacherous enemy. Camden us that she said, alluding to the charges against her with regard to Babington's plot, "that it was an easy thing counterfeit the ciphers and characters of others, as a young man very lately in France, who himself to her son's base brother ; and that she was afraid this was done by Walsingham, to bring her to her end ; who, as she heard, practised both against life, her son's."

The detail of Walsingham's secret machinations would fill a volume. Perhaps the most remarkable was that by which he managed for a considerable time to prevent the fitting out of that famous expedition called the Spanish Armada. [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] obtained intelligence from Madrid that Philip had informed his ministers that he had written to Rome, to disclose to the Pope the secret object of his great preparations by sea and land, and to beg his Holiness's blessing on the enterprise; and that he should conceal his views from them till the return of the courier. Walsingham, so far informed, employed a Venetian priest, one of his resident spies at Rome, to gain a copy of the King of Spain's letter. The priest corrupted a gentleman of the Pope's bedchamber, who took the key of his Holiness's cabinet out of his pocket while he slept; transcribed the letter; and returned the key. Hence Walsingham discovered that Philip had negotiated to raise the money to equip his fleet by bills on Genoa; and he contrived, through the aid of Sutton, the famous founder of the Charter-House, as it is said, and other eminent English merchants at Genoa, that nearly all those bills should be protested, and by that artifice impeded the sailing of the fleet for more than twelve months.

Walsingham, like several others of Elizabeth's most [REDACTED] servants, received few solid marks of her favour. [REDACTED] never held any public office, in addition to his laborious [REDACTED] unprofitable Secretaryship, except that of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which was not conferred on him till about 1587, late in his life, and he afterwards obtained the Order of the Garter. [REDACTED] lived and died miserably poor; for, such was his zeal, and such his mistress's baseness, that he lavished great sums from his own purse on the public service, and was never repaid. Camden says, that "he watched the practices of the papists with so great an expense that he lessened his estate by that means, and brought himself so far in debt that [REDACTED] buried privately, by night, in St. Paul's Church, without [REDACTED] of funeral ceremony." [REDACTED] truly stated, for in this will I find his passage—"I desire that [REDACTED] body may be buried without any such extraordinary ceremonies as usually appertain to a man serving in my place, in respect of the greatness of my debts, and the mean state I shall leave my [redacted] and heir in ; charging both my executor and overseers, to see this duly accomplished, according to the special trust and confidence I repose in them." He bequeaths to that heir, his only surviving child, no more than an annuity of one hundred pounds, and orders his "lands in Lincolnshire" to [redacted] sold for the payment of his debts. [redacted] [redacted] of April, 1690, of a local complaint, [redacted] understood by the surgeons of that day ; [redacted] rather, [redacted] Corn- [redacted] [redacted] much probability tells us, by the violence of the medicines which [redacted] administered to him ; having been twice married ; first, to Anne, daughter of Sir George Barnes, [redacted] Alderman of London, who died childless ; secondly, to Ursula, daughter of Henry St. Barbe, of Somersetshire, and widow of [redacted] Worsley, who brought him [redacted] daughters, Frances [redacted] Mary, the latter of whom died unmarried in June, 1680. Frances [redacted] thrice splendidly wedded : first, to the memorable Sir Philip Sidney ; secondly, to Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex ; and, thirdly, to Richard de Burgh, Earl of Clanricarde ; by each of whom [redacted] [redacted] [redacted]

Sir Francis Walsingham founded a Divinity Lecture [redacted] Oxford, and acknowledged [redacted] affection to King's College in Cambridge, by bestowing on it a library. A book, which appeared not long after his death, and which [redacted] frequently been reprinted, intitled "Arcana Anica, [redacted] Walsingham's [redacted] of Prudential Maxims," [redacted] usually been rep[re] [redacted] the work of his pen ; but was more probably a [redacted] [redacted] by some confidential person about him.

SIR ~~XXXXXXXXXX~~ HATTON.

We know but enough of this gentleman's history to make us wish for more. His elevation to the first place in the cabinet, and to the supreme seat in the administration of justice, coupled with the fantastic singularity of the incongruous and unconnected steps by which he ascended, throw about his legend an air of romance, while our utter ignorance of the motives which induced Elizabeth thus greatly and strangely to distinguish him, involve it in suitable mystery. It is scarcely less extraordinary that these circumstances should not have excited the curiosity of the historians and pamphleteers of the succeeding century, or, if they did inquire into them, that they should have withheld from us the fruit of their researches, recording only the silly and incredible tale that he danced himself into his preferments. ~~That~~ remarkable silence on a point of history so likely to provoke discussion, induces a suspicion that it arises from fear, or prudence, or delicacy. Hatton was one ~~of~~ the handsomest and most accomplished men of his time, and the conduct of Elizabeth had already betrayed, in more than one instance, ~~the~~ extravagances into which personal predilections, of a nature not easy to be defined, were capable of leading her. These are facts of such notoriety, that the supposition of an additional instance of similar weakness will not be deemed a libel on the memory of the virgin Queen. That Hatton was an object of this anomalous partiality seems highly probable, and, had his character been marked by the ambition of

Leicester, or the richness of Essex, the ground of his good fortune would perhaps have been not less evident than theirs.

He descended from a junior line of the very ancient house of Hatton of Hatton in Cheshire, which migrated into Northamptonshire, and was the third and youngest son of William Hatton of Holdenby, by Alice, daughter of Laurence Saunders, of Herringworth, both in that county. He was born in 1539, or in the succeeding year, and, after having been carefully instructed in his father's house, was entered a gentleman commoner of St. Mary Hall, in Oxford, where he probably remained not long, as he quitted the university without having taken a degree, and enrolled himself in the society of the Inner Temple. It has been said that he was placed there not to study the law with a view of qualifying himself for the profession, but to give him the advantages of a familiar intercourse with men who joined to deep learning an extensive knowledge of the world and of the arts of social prudence. This report was probably invented for the sake of increasing the wonder excited by his final promotion; though thus much is certain, that we hear nothing of his practice in any of the courts, nor indeed have we any direct intelligence that he was ever called to the bar. It is amply recorded, however, that he joined at least in the sports of his fellow students, for he was at one of those romantic entertainments which at that time the Inns of Court frequently presented to royalty, that he first attracted the notice of the Queen. "Sir Christopher Hatton," as Naunton somewhat obscurely says, "came into the court as Sir John Perrott's opposite; as Perrott was used to say, 'by the galliard,' for he came thither as a private gentleman of the Inns of Court, in a masque; and, for his activity and person, which was tall and proportionable, taken into her favour." Honest Camden, with more plainness, tells us that, "being young, and of a comely tallness of body, and amiable countenance, he got into such favour with the Queen," &c.

He was presently admitted into her band of gentlemen

pensioners, at that time composed of fifty young men of the best families in the kingdom, and was soon after placed [REDACTED] gentlemen of her privy chamber; then appointed captain [REDACTED] her body-guard, [REDACTED] vice-chamberlain of her household, about [REDACTED] time of [REDACTED] promotion [REDACTED] which latter office he was knighted, and sworn of the privy council. In 1586 Elizabeth granted to him and his heirs the [REDACTED] of Purbeck, in Dorsetshire, and in [REDACTED] year [REDACTED] [REDACTED] as one of her commissioners for the trial, or [REDACTED] for the conviction, of [REDACTED] Queen of Scots. It is [REDACTED] that Mary was persuaded chiefly by his reasoning to submit [REDACTED] their jurisdiction, and Camden has preserved the speech which for [REDACTED] purpose he addressed to her, and which exhibits little either of eloquence [REDACTED] argument. "You are accused," he said, "but not condemned, to have conspired the destruction of our lady and Queen anointed. You say you are a Queen; be it so; however in such a crime as this the royal dignity itself [REDACTED] not exempted from answering, either by the civil or canon law, nor by the law of nations nor of nature; for if such [REDACTED] of offences might be committed without punishment, [REDACTED] justice would stagger, yea fall to the ground. If you be innocent you wrong your reputation in avoiding trial. You protest yourself to be innocent, but Queen Elizabeth thinketh otherwise, and that not without ground, and is heartily sorry for the same. To examine [REDACTED] your innocence, she hath appointed commissioners, honourable persons, prudent and upright men, who are ready to hear you according to equity, with favour, and will rejoice with all their hearts if you shall clear yourself of what you are charged with. Believe me, the Queen herself will be transported with joy, who affirmed to me, at my coming from her, that never anything befel her that troubled her more than that you [REDACTED] [REDACTED] charged with such misdemeanours. Wherefore lay aside the bootless claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which now can be of no use unto you; appear to your trial, and show your innocence; lest by avoiding trial you draw upon yourself a suspicion, and stain your reputation with an [REDACTED] blot and aspersion."

On [REDACTED] twenty-third of April, 1587, to [REDACTED] of the country, he was appointed Lord High Chancellor, unluckily succeeding in that great office Bromley, a lawyer of the highest fame; and on the twenty-third of May, in the succeeding year, as though to crown properly the heterogeneous graces which had been already bestowed on him, was installed a Knight of the Garter. Camden, the only writer [REDACTED] has affected to account for his appointment to the Great Seal, informs us, rather improbably, [REDACTED] "he was advanced to it by the Court arts of some, that by his absence from Court, and the troublesome discharge of so great a place, which they thought him not to be able to undergo, his favour with the Queen might flag and grow less." He was received, naturally enough, in the Chancery Court, with cold and silent disdain, and it is even said that the barristers for a time declined to plead before him; but the sweetness of his temper, and the general urbanity of his manners, soon overcame those difficulties, while [REDACTED] earnestness and honesty with which he evidently applied the whole force of a powerful mind to qualify himself for his high office, gradually attracted to him the esteem of the public. "He executed," says the historian just now quoted, "the place with the greatest state and splendour of any that we ever saw, and what he wanted in knowledge of the law he laboured to make good by equity and justice." He is said to have introduced several good rules into the practice of his court, and to have [REDACTED] length acquired, by the wisdom of his decrees, and by the moderation, impartiality, and independence of his conduct on the bench, an eminent share of popularity. Anthony Wood asserts that he composed several pieces on legal subjects, none [REDACTED] which however are extant, except one, which has been plausibly attributed to him, intitled "A Treatise concerning Statutes, or Acts of Parliament, and the Exposition thereof," which was not printed till 1677.

Naunton, again with ■■■■ obscurity, thus ■■■■ cludes the very short notices which he ■■■■ left ■■ of Hatton. " ■■ was a gentleman that, ■■■■ the graces of his person ■■■■ dancing, had also the adjectaments of a strong and subtle capacity: ■■ that could soon learn the discipline and garb ■■■■ of the times and court. The truth is, he had ■ large proportion ■ gifts and endowments, but too much of the ■■■■ of envy, and he ■■■■ ■ mere vegetable of the court, ■■■■ ■■■■ up ■ night, and sank again ■ his noon." Does Naunton ■■■■ that Hatton ■■■■ envious, or that he was the object of envy in others?

With relation to one, of the character of whose mind, and of the extent of whose talents and accomplishments ■ little has been handed down to us, it is fortunate to be able to form some opinion from the familiar effusions of his own pen. In the great treasure of epistolary remains of the eminent men of his time, Hatton's letters are of rare ■■■■. No apology then will be necessary for illustrating this unavoidably imperfect sketch with two of them; the one, without date, to Elizabeth, from a rough draft in the Harleian MSS., and hitherto unpublished; the other, now reprinted from the Cecil Papers, to the gallant and unfortunate Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex. The first is indorsed—"S^r. Ch^r. Hatton, Vicechamberlaine to the Queene, upon ■■■■ words ■ ■■■■ Queene, ■■■■ protestacion of his ■■■■ innocence."

"If ■■■■ woundes of the thought wear not most dangerous of ■■■■ wthout speedy dressing ■ shold not ■■■■ trouble yo^r. Ma^y. wth. the lynes of my co^rplaynt; and if whatsoever ■■■■ from you ■■■■ not ether very gracious or greivous to ■■ what you sayd wold not synke ■ deeply in my bosome. My profession hath been, is, and ■■■■ shalbe, to your Ma^y. all duty wthin order, ■ reverent love wthout measure, ■ all trothe wthout blame; insomuch as when I shall not not be fownde soche as to yo^r. Highness Caesar sought ■ have hys wife ■

himselfe, not onely wthout synne, but also not to be suspected, I wish my spright devyded from my body as his spowse was from [] hedde; [] therefore, upon yesternight's wordes, I am driven to say to yo'. Ma^y. either to satisfye wronge conceyts, or to answer false reports, that if the speech you used of yo'. Turke [] ever passe my penne or lippes to any creature owt of yo'. Highnes' hearing, but to my L. of Burghley, wth. whom [] have talked bothe of the man & the matter, I desyre no lesse condemnation than as a traytor, & no more pardon than hys ponyshment; and, further, if ever I [] spake or sent to the embassad. of France, Spayne, or Scotland, or have accompanied, to my knowledge, any that conferres wth. them, I doe renounce all good from yo'. Ma^y. in erthe, & all grace from God in heaven; wth. assurans if yo'. H. thinke not sufficyent, [] the knees of my harte I hu'bly [] yo'. Ma^y. handes, not so much for my satisfaction [] yo' own suerty, make [] perfestest triall hereof; for if upon such occasions it [] please yo'. Ma^y. to syfte the chaffe from the wheate, the corne of yo'. co'monwealth wolde be more pure, & myxt graine wolde lesse infect the synnowes of yo'. suerty, wth. God most strengthen, [] yo'. Ma^y. best & longest preservation."

[] letter to Essex, then commanding the English troops [] the siege of Ronen, in which his brother, Walter, [] lately fallen, forms a striking contrast to the bombastic piece which, in conformity to her own taste, he [] to the Queen, and may perhaps be justly considered as an example of the best epistolary composition of the time.

"My very good Lord,

"Next after my thankses for yo'. honorable l^{tr}., I will assure yo'. Lo^p. that, for my part, I have not failed to use the [] endeavors I cold for [] effecting of yo'. desire [] remaininge ther for some longer tyme, but wthall I must ad-

you her Ma^y. been drawn thereunto wth. exceeding hardenes, maketh her in it is for that she yo^r. Lo^d. not sufficiently consider dishonor that ariseth unto her by King's ether dalliance or want of regard, having not sent so friendly to his aid from so great a Prince, under the conduct of so great a personage, in some ployment of importance all this while: wherefore, by her Ma^y's co'mandement, also for the unfeigned good wyll I bear yo^r. L^d., I am very earnestly to advise you you have gre^t for the accomplishment of Highnes instructi'ons effectually, and according to her intenc'ons, in thinges wherein you are deale wth. the Kings."

"Further my good Lord, lett me be bolke to you of a matter that many of yo^r. frendes here gretefully feare, namely, that the late accident of yo^r. noble brother, who hath valiantly honorably spent lyfe in his Prince's troy's service, draw you not, through griefe or passion, to hazard yo^rselfe over venturously. Yo^r. Lo^d. best knoweth that true valour consisteth rather constant performinge of that wth. hath been advisedly forstought than in aptnes readines of thrusting yo^r. p^{er}son indifferently into every daunger. You have many waies, & many tymes, made sufficient proof of yo^r. valientnes: No doubteth but that you have enough, you have not overmauche: therfore, in regard of the services her Ma^y. expecteth to receve from you, and in respect greife that would growe to the whole realme by the of one of that honorable birth, & that worthe wth. is sufficiently known (as greater hath not bene any that hath borne tharin these many yeeres) I must, even before Almighty God, praye require yo^r. Lo^d. have circumspectnes of yo^rselfe wth. fitt for generall of yo^r. worte. Lastly my Lo., I hope you doubt of good disposic'ons I bear towards yo^r. Lo^d., nor that out of the same ther ariseth remaineth in me a desire to doe yo^r. Lo^d. all the service that shalbe in my pore abilitie to p^rforme, & therefore I shall not neede to spende many wordes in that behalf; but, wth. my earnest prayers for yo^r. good success in all yo^r. honorable actions, & after, for yo^r. safe returne, to the comfort of yo^r. frendes & wellwillers here, I leave yo^r. Lo^d. to God's most holy & m^{er}cifull protection. From London, the 5th of October, 1593.

"Yo^r. good L^{dy} most assured and true frende,

"CR^{ISTOPHER}. HATTON."

The learned historian, already so frequently quoted, records that "he was a man of a pious nature, and of opinion that in matters of religion neither fire nor sword was to be used; a great reliever of the poor; and of singular bounty and munificence to students and learned men, for which [redacted] those of Oxford chose him Chancellor of their University." He succeeded the favourite Leicester in that dignified office in September, 1588. [redacted] is said in [redacted] earlier days [redacted] have sacrificed occasionally to [redacted] Muse, of which, however, no proof is extant, except in the tragedy of "Tancred and Gismunda," which was the joint production of five students of the Inner Temple; [redacted] acted by some members of that Society before the Queen in 1568; and printed in 1592. To the fourth [redacted] is subscribed "Composit Ch^r. Hatton."

[redacted] death, which happened on the twentieth of November, 1591, has been ascribed in great measure to the harshness [redacted] [redacted] which [redacted] demanded [redacted] instant payment of a great sum in [redacted] hands, arising from the collection of [redacted] [redacted] and tenths. "[redacted] had hopes," [redacted] Camden, "in regard of the favour he was in with her, [redacted] would have forgiven him; [redacted] [redacted] could not, having once cast him down with a harsh word, raise him [redacted] again, though she visited him, and endeavoured to comfort him." He was [redacted] [redacted] Paul's Cathedral, [redacted] having [redacted] a bachelor, bequeathed [redacted] fortune to [redacted] nephew, Sir William Newport,

■ Harringham, in Warwickshire, ■ remainder to Christopher, son and heir of John Hatton, his nearest kinsman of the ■ line. ■ William Newport, who assumed the ■ ■ Hatton, ■ childless, ■ Christopher succeeded accordingly; his son and heir, of the same name, was created in ■ ■ Hatton, of Kirby, ■ Northamptonshire: and the heir-male of that son in 1682 obtained the title of Viscount; both which became extinct about 1770.

WILLIAM ALLEN,

THE face and the character of this remarkable person have hitherto been almost equally unknown. While he lived, and for several years after his death, to have pronounced his portrait might have been deemed misprision of treason, to have spoken favourably even of the slightest act of his life would certainly have been considered as a high misdemeanour. He was perhaps the most formidable enemy to the reformed faith, and the ablest apologist for the Romish church, that England ever produced; for he was armed at all points, either for attack or defence, and indefatigable in the prosecution of each. He was generally learned, but in sacred and ecclesiastical history profoundly; and while he reasoned with equal acuteness, boldness, and eloquence, used that urbanity of expression, so common in the polemics of his time, which polishes, while it sharpens, the weapons of argument, and disarms an adversary, at least of personal enmity. He exercised in fact, though without the name, the office of viceroy to the Pope for the Romish church in England; and in that character opposed, with a most honest zeal, the progress of a system which the most part of Europe then considered as a frightful schism, and which was at that time indebted to his support perhaps more to the vigilance and severity of Elizabeth's government than to the affection of its professors. That system had already become firmly interwoven with the civil polity of England, and the danger gerous enemy to a state is he who would wound it through the shield of its religious establishment. Elizabeth, therefore, would have acted but with strict justice had she put Cardinal Allen to death, as she certainly would, could she have got him into her power; and he would have been, as justly, canonized.

██████████ descended from two respectable, and rather ancient families, for he ██████████ the second son of John Allen, the elder line of whose house ██████████ been long seated at Brockhouse, in Staffordshire, by Jennet, daughter of a Lyster, of Westby, in Yorkshire. He ██████████ born ██████████ Rosall, in the latter county, about the year 1532, and became a student of Oriel College in 1547, where he ██████████ so distinguished for ██████████ talents, and for ██████████ rapidity and ██████████ studies, ██████████ within ██████████ years afterwards unanimously elected a fellow of ██████████ house; and before he had ██████████ the ██████████ of twenty-five, was chosen Principal of ██████████ Mary's Hall, and ██████████ the Proctors of the University. About 1558, he ██████████ appointed a Canon of York, but was scarcely fixed there when ██████████ death of Queen Mary blasted all ██████████ hopes of further preferment in his own country. ██████████ continued, however, in England till 1560, when he retired to Louvain, and fixed his residence for a time in the famous theological college there, which, since the accession of Elizabeth, ██████████ become the favourite place of refuge for those of the English Catholic divines who ██████████ the highest reputation for learning and zeal. But the passive devotions of a ██████████ pious asylum were ill suited to the disposition of one who seemed to exist but for the service of his church: he returned, under ██████████ pretence of seeking relief ██████████ his native air from a lingering illness, and settled in Lancashire, where his endeavours to reclaim the wanderers from ██████████ profession became soon ██████████ notorious that the magistrates chased ██████████ from that county. He went then into Oxfordshire, where he not only followed the same course, but published treatises in ██████████ English language, which he had printed ██████████ Lovain,—“In Defence of ██████████ lawful Power ██████████ Authority

■ the Priesthood to remit Sins ;"—“ Of the Confession of Sins to God's Ministers ;” and ■ third, intituled, “ The Church's Meaning concerning Indulgences commonly called Popes' Pardons.” Such a visitor could not long be permitted to remain near the University. He removed, doubtless under compulsion, into the neighbourhood of Norwich, where he dwelt chiefly in the house of the Duke ■ Norfolk, and, having composed there ■ strenuous defence of his church, under the title of “ Certain brief Reasons concerning Catholic Faith,” returned ■ more to Oxford, and holdly took up his residence there. His attempts, though with unabated zeal, were ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ secretly practised. He ceased to publish his opinions, and contented himself with endeavouring to gain individual proselytes by the acuteness of his arguments, and the charms of his conversation. An experiment of that kind, in which he had fully succeeded, drew down ■ him the vehement resentment of the relations of his convert, who happened to be zealous reformers. They prosecuted him with the utmost vengeance ; he found ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ to escape from the consequences ; and quitted England, never again to return.

He fled to Flanders, and, after having resided for some time in ■ monastery in the city of Mechlin, removed about 1608 to Douay, where an academy had been some years before established, which had acquired considerable reputation. On that foundation he raised the college which after many vicissitudes yet subsisted there in much fame ■ the commencement of the accursed French revolution, when its peaceful inmates ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ dispersed, and it became first ■ military hospital, and, since, ■ manufactory. To this seminary, which ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ declaredly devoted to the reception of learned English Romanists who had ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ their country for religion's sake, ■ ■ ■ gave a regular collegiate form, and procured from the Pope a yearly stipend for ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ maintenance. He ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ now appointed ■ Canon of the archiepiscopal church of Cambrai, and, soon after, of that of Rheims, in France, where he prevailed on the great family of ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ to erect another college for the same purpose, to which he removed the members of his house ■ Douay, during ■ distraction which for ■ ■ agitated the Netherlands. ■ ■ commenced also a ■ ■ at Rome, and two in Spain. All these were devoted ■ ■ education of English youth, and every sort ■ learning ■ cultivated in them to the ■ perfection ■ the time ; but the grand and secret object of the teachers ■ ■ instruct their pupils in the religious and ■ doctrines of the church of Rome : to inspire them with the ■ zealous ■ implicit veneration towards all its institutions ; ■ ■ to qualify them to become, when they should return to their own country, the ■ effectual of all missionaries.

■ spite of the personal application ■ activity ■ these objects necessarily required, it should seem that his pen too ■ almost incessantly employed, as well in a continual correspondence with ■ ■ and abettors in England, ■ in the composition of multifarious publications which he disseminated throughout Europe with the utmost industry. Elizabeth, who held her brother Sovereigns and their councils in contempt, ■ awed by the talents, the perseverance, and, perhaps most of all, by the sincerity of this man. He fought against her, or, in other words, against that system of ■ ■ which she was then the life and soul, as well in the field as in the closet ; for while he opposed himself, with exquisite power of argument, to her most eminent divines, and used ■ sweetest persuasion to those whom he hoped to convert, ■ Catholic soldiers and mariners of England, ■ well as those of Spain, went into battle with treatises in their hands which he had written for their use, and adapted ■ their capacities. Thus he prevailed on ■ William Stanley, ■ Rowland York, who commanded a body ■ thirteen hundred ■ in ■ Low Countries, to surrender ■ the Spaniards, in 1587, the strong fortress of Deventer, ■ other places, with their garrisons ; and, immediately after, printed a letter, intituled, " Epistola de Deventris Ditione," together with a translation into English, in which he highly commended their treachery, and incited others ■ imitate it.

So, too, ■ the following year, upon the sailing of the Spanish Armada, ■ published "A Declaration of the Sentence ■ the Fifth," by ■ that Pope ■ given plenary indulgence and pardon of ■ sins, to ■ who would ■ in depriving Elizabeth of her kingdom; ■ which ■ ■ supplement, ■ energetically conceived and written, with the title ■ "An Admonition ■ Nobility and People ■ England." ■ herself bore testimony ■ the weight and importance of this book by dispatching a minister ■ the Prince of Parma, Governor of the Low Countries for the King of Spain, specially to expostulate with ■ ■ ■ publication of it.

For these eminent services ■ his church, he ■ ■ length, ■ the twenty-eighth of July, 1587, created ■ Cardinal Priest, and in 1589 consecrated Archbishop of Mechlin, to which latter dignity the King of Spain added the gift of ■ rich abbey ■ Naples. The utter failure of the great Spanish naval expedition, ■ which the Roman Catholics had founded such mighty hopes, seems to have broken his spirit. He retired to Rome immediately after that event, "under ■ great disappointment," says Camden, "and at length tired out with the heats and dissensions of the English fugitives, both scholars and gentlemen." That historian, zealous ■ he ■ for the reformed faith, and writing under the influence almost naturally produced by his ■ vitude to Elizabeth, speaks of Allen with less asperity than might have been expected; while Anthony Wood, ■ independent, though perhaps not unjustly suspected of ■ leaning to the Romish church, having very fairly stated the invectives of several authors against him, adds—"Let writers ■ what they please, certain it is that he ■ ■ active man, and of great parts, and high prudence: ■ he was religious, and zealous in his profession: restless till ■ had performed what he had undertaken: ■ ■ very affable, genteel, and winning, and that his person ■ handsome and proper; which, with ■ innate gravity, commanded respect from those ■ came near, or had to ■ with him." His ■ in literary composition was admirable. Of his Latin little need be [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] in which he lived was ornamented by many distinguished writers in [REDACTED] language, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] would have been strange indeed had not such a man appeared in the [REDACTED] rank: but his English style was incomparable. At [REDACTED] dignified [REDACTED] simple; clear and concise; choice [REDACTED] terms, without the slightest affectation; and full of an impassioned liveliness, which riveted the [REDACTED] even to [REDACTED] gravest disquisitions; it stood then wholly unrivalled, [REDACTED] would [REDACTED] now furnish no unworthy model. [REDACTED] however is the weakness, and it is almost blameless, of human prejudice, that the merits of [REDACTED] writer [REDACTED] condemned [REDACTED] share in the abomination of his doctrines, and that an example, which might have anticipated the gradual progress of nearly a century in [REDACTED] improvement of English prose, was rejected because he who set it was a rebel and a Papist.

Cardinal Allen wrote, in addition to the works already mentioned, "A Defence of the Doctrine of Catholics concerning Purgatory, 1585;" "An Apology, and true Declaration, of the Institution and Endeavours of the two English Colleges, in Rome and at Rheims, 1581;" "Apologia pro Sacerdotibus Societatis Jesu, et Seminariorum Alumnis, contra Edicta Regiæ," which I have never seen, and of which [REDACTED] [REDACTED] mentioned before it was probably a translation; "Concertatio Ecclesiæ Catholicæ;" and "Pissima Admonitio et Consolatio verè Christiana ad [REDACTED] Catholicos Angliæ;" the three [REDACTED] named tracts printed in one volume, 1583; [REDACTED] "A true, sincere, and modest Defence of the English Catholics that suffer for their Faith both [REDACTED] home and abroad, against a scandalous Libel intituled, the Execution of Justice in England," without date, of which a translation into Latin was published in 1584.

This very eminent person died at Rome on the 8th of October, 1594, and was buried in the chapel of the English College there.

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE.

THE narrative of a life for the materials of which no better source could exist than the journal and log-book of a naval commander, and in the absence, too, of those very authorities, may seem to promise very little of general interest. Drake was a seaman from his cradle, and applied to his profession talents which might have rendered him eminent in any character, with such undeviating perseverance, that we never find him for an instant in another: yet so dear is that character to Englishmen, that they will dwell with delight on the insulated detail of his expeditions; on discoveries insignificant in the sight of modern navigators, and on tactics which have become obsolete; on motives which have long ceased to actuate our national policy, and on results of the benefit which we are no longer sensible.

His birth, we might be expected, would be traced in a pedigree of the descendants of his brother Thomas, the inheritor of his wealth, recorded in the Visitation of Devonshire made in 1690, he is simply stated to have been a son of "Francis Drake of that county," and the name of his mother does not appear. Camden, however, tells us some particulars of his origin, which, in spite of an anachronism or two, that have not escaped the vigilance of antiquarian zeal, may be depended on, especially as he informs us they were communicated to him by Drake himself. His father, we learn from a respectable authority, was embraced by Protestant persuasion, having been threatened with prosecution under the law of the Six Articles, fled country wandered into Kent. "There," continues Camden, "after the death of Henry the Eighth, he got a place among the seamen in the King's navy, to which he was attached to them, and soon after he was ordained deacon, and became vicar of the church of Upnor, upon the river Medway, where the royal navy usually rides: but by reason of his poverty, he put his son apprentice to the master of a bark, his neighbour, who held him closely to his business, by which he made him an able seaman, his bark being employed in sailing along the shore, and sometimes in carrying merchandise into the Netherlands and France. The youth, being painful and diligent, so pleased the old man by his industry, that, being a bachelor, at his death he bequeathed his bark unto him by his last will." It is said, but with some uncertainty, that he was born in the town of Tavistock, in 1543.

In his early manhood he became purser of a merchant ship trading to Spain, and two years after made a voyage to Guinea, probably in the same capacity. About this time he attracted the notice of his countryman, and, as some have reported, his kinsman, Sir John Hawkins, and was in 1567 appointed by that celebrated navigator captain of a ship named the Judith, in which he accompanied Hawkins to South America, and eminently distinguished himself in the more glorious than fortunate exploits in the Gulf of Mexico, which were the issue of that expedition. Drake lost in it the whole of that little which he had saved in his more humble employments, but he returned with a reputation which presently attracted public attention, and with a knowledge of the wealth and an experience of the naval warfare and resources of Spain in those parts, which enabled him to form the most promising plans for his future prosperity. He determined to invite the resolute, the needy, and the avaricious, to join him in an expedition thither, and represented to them, with a power of persuasion with which he has been eminently gifted, the vast acquisitions that might be expected, and the clear probability of success.

The bait taken with an [redacted] [redacted] least equal to his hopes, and in 1570, and [redacted] following year, he made two voyages, the former with two ships, the latter with one; and in these trips, though [redacted] private view in undertaking them extended not beyond mere experiment, which [redacted] could not have prosecuted without assistance, [redacted] managed with such sagacity [redacted] to encourage those who [redacted] adventured with him by [redacted] ample return; to render himself independent; and [redacted] prevent in [redacted] great [redacted] any suspicion [redacted] [redacted] Spaniards of the extent of the designs which he secretly meditated against them.

In 1573, however, they were somewhat disclosed. On the twenty-fourth of March in that year, he sailed from Plymouth, in a ship named the Pascha, accompanied by another in which he had performed his two former voyages, called the Swan, in which he placed [redacted] of his brothers, John Drake. On board these vessels, which were of very moderate burthen, he had no more than seventy-three men and boys; yet with this slender force he stormed, [redacted] the twenty-second of the following July, the town of Nombre de Dios, in the Isthmus of Darien, and soon after seized that of Santa Cruz, where he obtained a considerable booty; but the most important result of these acquisitions was the establishment of a friendly intercourse with [redacted] rulers of the natives, by the aid of whose intelligence he intercepted a convoy of plate, [redacted] it was the custom then [redacted] call it, of such [redacted] bulk that he abandoned the silver from mere inability to convey it, and brought only the gold [redacted] his ships. [redacted] [redacted] needless [redacted] [redacted] that he returned with immense wealth, and the fidelity and exactness with which he allotted [redacted] his partners their respective shares in his good fortune, contributed equally with [redacted] [redacted] raise [redacted] fame. The people, in the [redacted] time, in their hatred to Spain, which Elizabeth used every artifice to chafe, viewed the success of his piracies, for they were nothing less, with rapture. Enriched himself, beyond [redacted] [redacted] occasions [redacted] even splendid domestic life, he now gave way to a landable ambition ■ ■ ■ in public service, ■ ■ ■ recommend himself effectually to a court ■ ■ ■ government in which much of ■ ■ ■ ancient love of warlike gallantry yet subsisted, fitted out, at ■ ■ ■ own charge, three frigates with which he sailed to Ireland, to serve as a volunteer against the rebels, in aid of the land forces under the command of Walter, ■ ■ ■ of Essex. Stowe, without reciting the particulars of his conduct, informs us that he performed many glorious actions there. His stay, however, in Ireland ■ ■ ■ short, ■ ■ ■ on the premature death of that nobleman he returned; but the secret object of ■ ■ ■ excursion ■ ■ ■ fully obtained, for he acquired, probably through the recommendation of the amiable Essex, the patronage of Sir Christopher Hatton, by whom he ■ ■ ■ soon after introduced to Elizabeth.

Drake, in ■ ■ ■ last American voyage, had formed an imperfect outline of the enterprise which has immortalised his name. "He had descried," says Camden, "from ■ ■ ■ mountains the South Sea. Hereupon," continues the historian, "the ■ ■ ■ being inflamed with ambition of glory, and hopes of wealth, ■ ■ ■ so vehemently transported with desire to navigate that sea, that, falling down upon his knees, he implored the Divine assistance that he might at some time or other sail thither, and make a perfect discovery of the same; and hereunto he bound himself with a vow. From ■ ■ ■ time forward his mind was pricked continually to perform that vow." He now besought ■ ■ ■ obtained the ■ ■ ■ and countenance ■ ■ ■ the Queen to his project ■ ■ ■ a voyage thither, through ■ ■ ■ Straits of Magellan, ■ ■ ■ undertaking to which ■ ■ ■ Englishman had ever yet aspired. On the fifteenth ■ ■ ■ November, 1577, ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ from Plymouth in a ship ■ ■ ■ one hundred tons, called ■ ■ ■ Pelican, having under his ■ ■ ■ command the Elizabeth, of eighty tons; the Swan, of fifty; the Marygold, of thirty; and ■ ■ ■ Christopher, of fifteen; embarking in his little fleet no more than one hundred and sixty-four men, amply supplied, however, with ■ ■ ■ necessary provisions. ■ ■ ■ concealed from ■ ■ ■ comrades of all ranks the course that he intended to take, giving out that ■ was for Alexandria; and after having been forced by a severe storm to return to the English coast to refit, quitted ■ finally on the thirteenth of December.

Drake's celebrated voyage is so well known, that it ■ be impertinent to give here any enlarged detail of it. ■ twentieth of August, having previously dismissed, ■ what reason we are not clearly told, two of the vessels which had accompanied him, he entered the Straits of Magellan, where a terrible storm separated him from the others, and ■ proceeded alone. On the twenty-fifth of September he quitted ■ Straits, and sailed, still molested by tempest, to the coast of Chili and Peru, which ■ skirted, attacking the Spanish settlements, which were wholly defenceless, and, having obtained immense spoil, prepared to return to England. Apprehensive, however, of the vengeance of the Spaniards, among whom the alarm was now fully spread, he determined to avoid the track by which he had entered the Pacific Ocean, and bent his course to the shores of North America, seeking, with that spirit of enterprise which so eminently distinguished him, a passage to Europe by the ■ of California. Disappointed in this endeavour, he sailed to the East Indies, and, returning to England by the Cape of Good Hope, landed at Plymouth on the third of November, 1580, the first of his countrymen by whom the honour of circumnavigating the whole of the known world had ever been enjoyed.

His arrival in London was hailed by the multitude with the utmost extravagance of approbation, but among the cool and discerning many were disposed to censure his conduct with severity. The policy, as well as the legality, of conniving ■ the sort of warfare which he had used against the Spaniards was freely questioned. His moral character was arraigned; and he was reported to have sacrificed to the private vengeance of the Earl of Leicester one of his principal officers, Doughty, whom he had charged ■ mutiny, and caused to be put to death during his voyage. In the mean time he was not without apologists of the better sort, who alleged that his attacks on the Spanish colonies were clearly justifiable under the laws of reprisal, and that Doughty, which seems to have been the fact, was regularly tried and condemned by such a Court Martial as could be formed under the circumstances of the expedition. While these questions were contending [redacted] increasing heat, [redacted] suddenly turned the balance in his favour, by the most unequivocal and public marks of her grace. She visited him on board his ship at Deptford; partook of a splendid banquet which he had provided; and conferred on him the honour of knighthood, commanding, among many other compliments of the most flattering nature, that the vessel in which he had achieved the voyage should be carefully preserved, as a precious memorial of his merit, and of the glory of her realm.

These testimonies of approbation produced in Drake their usual effect on generous and active minds—an ardent desire to signalise himself by further exploits. The rank, however, to which his fame and his immense wealth had now raised him in society, forbade the farther prosecution of that order of enterprise from which he had derived them, and some years elapsed before Elizabeth's determination to commence offensive hostilities against Spain, enabled her to call his powers into action in her immediate service. At length, in 1585, he received for the first time a royal commission, and was appointed to the command of twenty-one ships of war, with which, having on board eleven thousand soldiers, [redacted] sailed in the autumn to the West Indies, and, after having sacked the towns of [redacted] Jago and St. Domingo, passed to the coast of Florida, when he took Carthagená, and destroyed several other settlements of smaller importance. In 1587 he was dispatched with four of the largest ships in the Queen's navy [redacted] [redacted] merchants of [redacted] [redacted] twenty-six [redacted] of various burthens, to Spain, and in the Bay of Cadiz dispersed and crippled a fleet which lay there, completely equipped, under orders to proceed to Lisbon, the appointed rendezvous for the grand Armada, destroying more than a hundred of [redacted] store-ships, [redacted] several superior vessels. He then returned to Cape St. Vincent, ravaging [redacted] coast in [redacted] way, and [redacted] [redacted] of the Tagus ineffectually challenged [redacted] Marquis of Santa Cruz, the Spanish Admiral, to [redacted] combat. Having performed [redacted] splendid service, [redacted] obliged Philip to [redacted] [redacted] a whole year the execution of his great project of invasion, Drake turned his attention for an interval to his [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] merchants, and using a discretion [redacted] uncommon in those days of imperfect discipline, [redacted] to the Azores, to intercept a carrack of immense value, [redacted] whose coming [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] Indies [redacted] had received secret intelligence, which he accomplished, and returned to his country to receive [redacted] honours from his Sovereign, and increased homage from her subjects. In the ever-memorable service [redacted] following year, Drake, whom Elizabeth had appointed Vice-Admiral under Lord Howard of Effingham, had the chief share. His sagacity, his activity, and his undaunted courage, [redacted] equally conspicuous in the series of mighty actions which composed it, and [redacted] terrible vengeance experienced by the dispersed and flying Armada, [redacted] inflicted principally by his division of the fleet. Don Pedro de Valdes, a Spanish Admiral, by whom the enterprise had been planned, [redacted] it an honour to have surrendered to him, and was long [redacted] by him with a generous hospitality, which proved that [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] versed in the chivalrous [redacted] tenets as in the essentials of war. In his success in this glorious victory terminated [redacted] unmixed felicity which had [redacted] invariably attended him.

[redacted] [redacted] [redacted] distinguished by the ill-concerted [redacted] mismanaged attempt to place Don Antonio [redacted] the [redacted] of Portugal. In [redacted] expedition destined to that service the fleet was commanded by Sir Francis Drake, and [redacted] military, amounting to eleven thousand, by Sir John Norris. Drake had never before in any of his enterprises had a partner, and the main features of his character were such as might be expected to disqualify him for any division of authority. The commanders disagreed in ~~the~~ outact. Drake proposed to sail directly to Lisbon, but Norris insisted that the troops should be landed at Corunna, which the Admiral not only conceded, but promised to conduct the fleet immediately after up the Tagus to the capital. Unforeseen obstacles prevented his keeping his word ; Norris loaded him with reproaches ; and attributed the utter failure of the plan, which in fact arose from various causes, to Drake's absence. The Admiral was obliged to explain and justify ~~his~~ conduct to the Queen and Council, and was acquitted of all cause of blame, but his high spirit had been wounded by the mere inquiry, and he sought to console it by new views of conquest.

Some years passed, though the war with Spain still subsisted, before an opportunity presented itself. At length he prevailed on Elizabeth once more to send a powerful armament to Spanish America, under the direction of himself, and his old friend and original patron, Sir John Hawkins, and in a great measure at their private expense, the Queen, however, furnishing some of her stoutest ships. The fleet, consisting of twenty-seven vessels, which had been long ~~excited~~ by Spanish rumours, raised for the purpose of a new plan of invasion, sailed from Plymouth on the twenty-eighth of August, 1595. The plan of the expedition was to destroy Nombre de Dios, the scene of one of Drake's early and most gallant exploits, and then to march the troops, of which two thousand five hundred were embarked, to Panama, to seize the treasure supposed to have lately arrived there from Peru. When they were on the point of departure, Elizabeth apprised them that the Plate fleet had arrived in Spain, with the exception of one rich galleon, which had returned to Porto Rico for some necessary repairs, and which she advised them in the first place to secure. They left England differing in opinion on this question, Hawkins anxious ~~to~~ follow without delay the Queen's direction, and Drake earnest to commence their operations by a descent on the island of Teneriffe, which accordingly made, and proved wholly unsuccessful. They then sailed to Dominica, and in the month of June the Spaniards, who had been apprised of the main purposes of the voyage, despatched a strong convoy for the galleon, which they brought to safety, and so powerfully reinforced Diego Rico, that the English, on their arrival there, were obliged to content themselves with ravaging to little purpose the craft in the harbour, and to retire without having made any impression on the town; nor was their attack on Panama, on Christmas Day, more fortunate. Drake died, as is said, of a broken heart, amidst these reverses, and Drake barely survived them. A settled melancholy, attended by a slow fever, and terminating in a dysentery, the disease of the country, carried him off on the twenty-eighth of January, 1596, O. S., the fifty-first, or, according to some, in the fifty-fifth, year of his age.

Little has been said here of the natural character of this eminent person, and some circumstances of his life have been hitherto purposely omitted, for the sake of concluding this volume with the very words of a writer of the fair sex, who has been before us, in a late publication of singular merit, the fruits of most laborious and accurate historical research, clothed in the light and easy garb of refined table-talk. "The character of Sir Francis Drake," says this lady, "is remarkable not alone for those constitutional qualities of valour, industry, capacity, and enterprise, which the history of his exploits would necessarily lead us to infer; but for virtues which, on principle and reflection, render it in a high degree an object of respect and moral approbation. It is true that his aggressions on the Spanish settlements were originally founded on a notion of reprisals, equally irreconcilable to public law and private equity; but the exception of this error, which may find considerable palliation in the deficient education of the man, the prevalent opinions of the day, and the peculiar animosity against Philip the Second cherished in the bosom of every Protestant Englishman, the conduct of Drake appears to demand almost unqualified commendation. ■ was by sobriety, by diligence in the concern of his employers, and by a tried integrity, that he early raised himself from the humble station ■ an ordinary seaman to the command of a vessel. When placed in authority over others, he showed himself humane and considerate. His treatment of his prisoners was exemplary ; his veracity unimpeached ; his private life religiously pure and spotless. In the division of the rich booty which frequently rewarded his valour and his toils, he was liberal towards his crews, and scrupulously just to the owners ■ his vessels ; and in the appropriation of his own share of wealth, he displayed that munificence towards the public, of which, since the days of Roman glory, history has recorded so few examples. With the profits of one of his earliest voyages, in which he captured ■ town of Venta Cruz, ■ made prize of a string of mules laden with silver, he fitted out three stout frigates, and sailed with them to Ireland, where he served as a volunteer under Walter, Earl of Essex, ■ performed many brilliant actions. After the capture of a rich Spanish carrack ■ the Tercera in 1587, he undertook at his own expense to bring to the town of Plymouth, which he represented in Parliament, a supply of spring water, of which necessary article it suffered a great deficiency. This he accomplished by means of a canal or aqueduct, above twenty miles in length. Drake incurred some blame in the expedition to Portugal for failing to bring his ships ■ the river to Lisbon, according to his promise to Sir John Norris, the General ; but on explaining the case before the Privy Council on his return, he was entirely acquitted by them, having made ■ appear that under all the circumstances, to have ■ ships up the Tagus would have been ■ expose them to damage, without any benefit to the service. By his enemies this great man was stigmatised as vain and boastful

—a slight infirmity in one who had achieved so much by his own unassisted genius, and which the great flow of natural eloquence which he possessed may at once have produced and rendered excusable.”

■ has been erroneously asserted that Sir Francis Drake died a bachelor. ■ married, probably in his middle age, Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir George Sydenham, of ■ Sydenham, in Devonshire, who survived him, and ■ Courtenay, of Powderham Castle, in the same county. He left however no issue, and his brother Thomas became his heir, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Francis, who was created a Baronet in 1622, and is at present represented by his lineal descendant, Sir Francis Henry Drake, of Beckland Monachorum, in the county of Devon.

PHILIP HOWARD,

EARL OF ARUNDEL

THOMAS, fourth Duke of Norfolk, the first victim of his illustrious House to the jealousy of Elizabeth, took to his first wife Mary, second of the two daughters and coheirs of Henry Fitzalan, last Earl of Arundel of his family. By this lady he had an only son whose birth proved fatal to his mother, who had not attained to the age of seventeen ; but the child survived, and became the Peer who will be the subject of the present memoir. ■■■ was born at Arundel House, in the Strand, on the twenty-eighth of June, 1557, and baptised in the Palace of Whitehall with uncommon distinction, in the presence of the King and Queen ; and Philip, who was his godfather, and in compliment to whom he was named, left England for ever on the very day that the ceremony was performed. Notwithstanding this, and other royal flatteries, the Duke, his father, educated him in the protestant profession, which, however, he quitted at an early age for the religion of his ancestors, and from his sincerity in that mode of faith, and the patience and constancy with which he suffered the calamities which resulted from it, he seems to have fairly merited the title of martyr. ■■■ paternal dignities which he would have ■■■■ having been swept away by his father's attainder, he assumed that of Earl of Arundel in right of his mother, the possession of the castle of Arundel (a rare instance in this country, where ■■■ honours ■■■ unknown,) having ■■■ solemnly adjudged in Parliament in the eleventh year of Henry the Sixth to carry with it the Earldom. He was accordingly summoned among the Peers by that title in 1583, and in the same year restored in blood.

He possessed for a time a considerable share of Elizabeth's favour, which ■ probably owed to his youth, and other personal attractions, for he was, according to an account of him, written long after his death, by a domestic priest to his Countess, and which ■ still preserved ■ Norfolk House, "a very tall," or, as we should now say, stout, "man, and somewhat swarthy;" to which Dodd, in his Church History, adds that, "he had an agreeable mixture of sweetness and grandeur in his countenance." The Queen's partialities in this kind were in most cases nearly as fatal to their objects as her resentments, and so it proved in this instance. The Earl had been married at the age of fourteen to Anne, sister and coheir of Thomas, last Lord Dacre of Gillesland, of whom we shall presently give, as her memory well merits, some particulars. Elizabeth, says the manuscript lately quoted, "could not endure her, nor indeed the wife of any other to whom she shewed especial favour, and this distaste of the Queen's led the Earl to neglect his Lady, on which score ■ maternal grandfather, the old Earl of Arundel, and his aunt, the Lady Lumley, were so displeased that they alienated much of their property to others."

The Earl, however, was so captivated by the royal grace, that (to use again the words of the manuscript, from which ■ will observe, once for all, that such of the present memoir as is not of a public nature is chiefly extracted) "he made great feasts at Arundel House for the Ambassadors, Ministers, &c. on Coronation days, and other rejoicing days, and entertained the Queen, and all her Court, at Kenninghall and Norwich, for many days together." At one of these banquets, at Arundel House, Elizabeth herself had the profligate baseness to conceal herself, with Leicester, to overhear a conversation between the Earl and Sir Francis Walsingham and Lord Hudson, whom she had directed to tempt him into discourse on the subject of religion. It was probably soon after ■■■■ flagrant ■■■■ ■■■■ hospitality that ■■■■ ■■■■ suspected ■■■■ intriguing in favour of the Queen of Scots, and was placed in confinement in his own house, from which Elizabeth offered to ■■■■ him if he would ■■■■ her to chapel, and hear the service of the Reformed Church, which he steadily refused. ■■■■ matter, however, of specific accusation being yet ripe against him, he was set at liberty ; but soon after again apprehended, and committed to the Tower, from whence also he was released for want of evidence against him. ■■■■ repeated attacks, the jealousy of ■■■■ great ■■■■ and, in particular, of Lord Hudson, who ■■■■ been ■■■■ ■■■■ page, and owed great obligations to his family ; and the outrageous rigour with which the penal statutes against the Papists were then enforced, determined him to quit England, and he withdrew himself into Sussex ; where, having been betrayed, as is said, by one of his own servants, he was seized as ■■■■ was about to embark on an obscure part of the coast, near his castle of Arundel, and again ■■■■ to the Tower. He was now prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, and condemned to a fine of ten thousand pounds, and imprisonment during the Queen's pleasure, merely on the charges of entertaining Romish priests in his family ; of corresponding with Cardinal Allen ; and of meditating to leave the kingdom without the Queen's permission. In support of these accusations scarcely anything like proof was produced.

After four years' confinement, mostly so close as to prevent the possibility of new offence, he was arraigned of high treason, and on the fourteenth of April, 1589, brought to trial in Westminster Hall, where of the whole body of ■■■■ Peerage only twenty-five appeared ■■■■ sit in judgment on him. ■■■■ comported himself with great dignity and firmness. "When called on," says Camden, "to hold ■■■■ his hand, he raised it very high, saying 'Here is as true a man's heart and hand as ever came into this hall.' " In addition to the points which had been alleged against ■■■■ in the Star-Chamber, he was now accused of conspiring with Cardinal Allen to restore the Catholic faith in England; of having suggested that the Queen was unfit to govern; and of ordering masses to be said for the success of the Spanish Armada: [redacted] he intended to have withdrawn himself out of the realm, to serve with the Duke of Parma against his native country; and that he had been privy to the measure of issuing the Bull of Pope Pius the Fifth, for transferring Elizabeth's Crown to Philip of Spain.

History can scarcely produce another instance of so wretched and so wicked a perversion of judicial proceeding. Of the three witnesses produced against him, [redacted] Gardard, a man of the name of Shelley, and Bennet, a priest, the two former had nothing to say, and the last having previously declared by a letter to the Earl that his original false information to the Privy Council had been extorted from him by the rack, now spoke only as to the mass said for the success of the Spanish expedition under the dread of a repetition of torture. To this parole testimony, if it deserve to be so called, was added the production of two emblematical paintings which had been found in the Earl's custody, the one representing a hand throwing a serpent into fire, with the motto "If God is for us who can be against us?" the other, a lion without claws, inscribed "Yet still a lion;" and of some foreign letters in which he was styled "Duke of Norfolk." In the end no charge of high treason could be substantiated against him except on the ground of his having been reconciled to the Church of Rome, and on that only was [redacted] found guilty. [redacted] speeches during the trial evinced strong and polished talents. He repelled the partial and demultory attacks of Popham the Attorney-General, by [redacted] observations [redacted] prompt [redacted] ingenious argument, [redacted] occasionally [redacted] elegance. "The Attorney-General," said he, "has managed the letters and confessions produced against me as spiders do flowers, by extracting from them nothing but their poison."

Sentence of death, however, was passed on him, but

Elizabeth had secretly resolved that it should not be executed. He passed the remainder of his unfortunate life in ~~close~~ confinement, unceasingly employing ~~himself~~ in the strictest practice of devotion, and in the exercise of his pen on religious and moral subjects. "One book of Lanspergius," ~~the~~ the manuscript at Norfolk House, "containing an epistle of Jesus Christ to the faithful Soul, he translated out of Latin into English, and caused it to be printed for the furtherance of devotion. ~~He~~ wrote also three treatises on the excellency and utility of virtue, which never came to light, by reason he was obliged to send them away upon fear ~~a~~ a search before they were fully perfected and polished." Two ~~of~~ of ~~his~~ pious disposition remain in a ~~small~~ apartment in what ~~is~~ ~~called~~ Beauchamp's Tower, ~~in~~ Tower ~~at~~ London, which was his prison, and whose ~~walls~~ are covered with melancholy devices by the hands ~~of~~ many illustrious ~~and~~ prisoners. ~~There~~ find there ~~are~~ following inscriptions, the former of which has by some accident been omitted ~~in~~ the account of this interesting room published by the Society of Antiquaries in the thirteenth volume ~~of~~ their Archæologia.

"Sicut peccati causa vinciri opprobrium est, ita, e contra,
Christe custodire vincula sustinere maxima gloria est.

"Arundell, 26th of May 1667."

"Quanto plus afflictionis pro Christo in hoc sæculo, tanto plus gloriæ cum Christo in futuro. "Arundell,

June 22, 1667."

~~He~~ ~~was~~ suddenly taken ill, in August 1662, immediately after eating a roasted teal, the sauce of which was supposed to contain poison; for the cook who prepared it, and whom ~~he~~ ~~was~~ always suspected, and frequently endeavoured ~~to~~ vain ~~to~~ get removed, ~~came~~ to him when ~~in~~ ~~his~~ death-bed, ~~and~~ earnestly besought forgiveness for some offence, which, however, he would not disclose. The Earl narrowly escaped for the time with life, and lingered for nearly three years in extreme weakness, but never recovered. Shortly before his departure he petitioned the Queen for permission that his Lady, and some other friends, might visit him; and she answered, "that if he would but once attend the Protestant worship his prayer should be granted, and ■■■ should be moreover restored to his honours and estates, and to all the favour that she could show him." He was released from his miseries by the hand of death on Sunday, the nineteenth of October, 1595, and was buried on the following Tuesday in the chapel of the Tower, in the same grave with the Duke his father, where his body remained till the year 1624, when his widow and his son obtained permission to remove it to Arundel, where it was interred ■■■ an iron coffin, with an epitaph in Latin, stating the principal points of his persecution, and that he died "non absque veneni suspitione."

The Countess, his wife, possessed considerable talents, and virtues yet more eminent. She was a most earnest and zealous Roman Catholic, and it was probably through her persuasion and example that the Earl after their reconciliation, became a member of that Church. The instances given of her charity, her humility, and her patience, seem almost romantic. Several original letters from her to her daughter-in-law, Alathen Talbot, Countess of Arundel, are now in the possession of his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, and are composed in the best style of her time, and in a strain of unaffected piety, and natural tenderness, which lets us at once into her true character. Part of an elegiac poem written ■■■ by her, probably on the premature death of her Lord, remains also in the same custody, and abounds with the imperfect beauties of a strong, but unpolished, poetical fancy. Elizabeth's hatred pursued her even after the death of her husband. His attainder having thrown all his property into the Crown, and left her destitute, the Queen allowed her only eight pounds weekly, which was so ill paid that the Countess was frequently obliged to borrow, in order to procure necessaries; was prevailed on, with difficulty, to permit her to live in Arundel House in the Strand, from whence, however, she was always driven when thought to reside in neighbourhood, in Somerset House; occasionally imprisoned her; often insulted her; and always vilified her.

These noble persons had one son, Thomas, was restored by King James the First to his father's dignities and estates, and was afterwards the Earl of Arundel so highly distinguished by his admirable collection of works of refined taste and art: and one daughter, Elizabeth, who died unmarried at the age of fifteen years.

JOHN, FIRST LORD MAITLAND,

JOHN MAITLAND, perhaps in all respects the most eminent of a family in which great talents and elegant genius seem to have passed down with the regularity of hereditary succession, was the second son of Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, Keeper of the Privy Seal of Scotland, and a Lord of Session, by Mary, daughter of Thomas Cranstoun. He was born, according to some accounts, about the year 1537, though the inscription on his tomb, in stating the age at which he died, gives him to be 100. The date, however plausible the authority, is probably incorrect, as it is scarcely to be believed that he should have succeeded to those offices of high trust in which we shall presently find him, when he had scarcely attained to years of manhood. He was bred with much care in the study of the law, both in Scotland and on the Continent; and we are told that he had passed some years in fruitless attendance at the Court, when he was provided for by a grant of the Abbey of Kelso, which he afterwards exchanged for the Priory of Coldingham; yet the date of the patent by which that exchange was ratified is so early as the seventh of February, 1556. On the twenty-sixth of August, in the following year, on the resignation of his father, the Privy Seal was given to him by the Regent Murray, and on the second of the succeeding June he was appointed a Lord of Session.

It is scarcely necessary to inform the reader of history that [redacted] admission into the ministry occurred at the most critical period of the reign of the celebrated Mary. She was then a prisoner in the Castle of Lochleven, and the questions of her deposition, and the advancement of her infant son to [redacted] throne, [redacted] under discussion. His elder brother, William, at that time Secretary of State, a sketch of whose life is also given in this work, opposed those measures with the most earnest zeal; and he naturally followed the example of one to whose experience he looked for instruction, and to whom he was bound as well by ties of gratitude as of blood. Younger, however, and less artful, he sank under the [redacted] [redacted] of the contrary party, while that subtle and intriguing politician was left for a time at liberty to pursue his plans. He was deprived of his offices and his benefice, and fled for security to the Castle of Edinburgh, then under the command of Kirkaldy of Grange, a firm and able supporter of Mary's interests, with whom his brother also was a length obliged to seek refuge. Here he remained till that fortress surrendered [redacted] [redacted] troops of [redacted] [redacted] of Morton, [redacted] Regent, when he was [redacted] [redacted] the Castle of Tantallon, and early in the following year was removed to a less rigorous custody in the house [redacted] Lord Bonnerville, where he remained a prisoner till the fall of Morton, in 1581, when he was released by an order of the Privy Council.

He came again to the Court with every claim to distinction. His abilities were of the highest class; the character of his mind generous, honourable, and candid; his loyalty pure and disinterested: it had subjected him to [redacted] imprisonment of many years, during which he [redacted] [redacted] his brother fall [redacted] victim to the public principles on which they had mutually acted. James received him with becoming gratitude. On [redacted] arrival he [redacted] appointed a Senator of the College [redacted] Justice, and, on the eighteenth of May, 1584, knighted [redacted] placed in the office of Secretary of State, which had been so long and ably held by his brother. [redacted] now became in fact

first minister of Scotland, Mr James, whose ripening mind discovered that he had at last obtained a servant at once wise, faithful, moderate, held him in the most perfect confidence; his nobility, tired of parties, and his subdued storms which themselves raised, beheld without jealousy the favour of him in whom they could discern disposition to mix their intrigues, or to their power. He had, however, enemies. Stuart, first, and the most worthless, of the long series of minions by whom his master was tarnished, not only conceived a bitter hatred against him, but inspired of the junior branches of the House of Stuart with the sentiment. This man, with no apparent recommendation illegitimate descent from the royal, James had promoted, as it should be by an act of insanity, from station of Captain of his Guard to that of Lord Chancellor, with an Earldom. His power became, even a few months unbounded, and his fall was as sudden. He fled with terror from those violent attacks which public vengeance then often produced in Scotland, aided in this instance by the secret influence of Elizabeth, and would have been scarcely again heard of had he not from his retirement accused the Secretary of being accessory to the death of Mary, and of a design to deliver the person of the King to the Queen of England. When cited to substantiate the charges, which were universally discredited, he neither appeared nor produced witnesses; and James, having kept the office of Chancellor virtually vacant for a considerable time, in the vain hope his dastardly favourite might return, length bestowed Maitland. patent or commission for that post is the thirty-first of May, 1587.

Stuart's accusation had been in fact addressed to the royal the popular feelings of the moment, and for support he expected from them. Maitland, dispassionate, impartial, and consistent, endeavoured to the last to save the unhappy Mary; but, the blow having been stricken, exerted his utmost powers of persuasion to save his master from the ruinous consequences of an impotent resentment, and succeeded; and on a misconception of this wise policy, which to ordinary and heated minds might seem to indicate at least an indifference to her tragical fate, had Stuart hoped to insinuate that he had been a party in accelerating it. The disposition of Maitland indeed was not less pacific than that of James, but the forbearance of the one arose from prudence; of the other from timidity. The King, therefore, was submissive only to his brother Sovereigns; the minister moderate towards all. In this spirit he undertook and accomplished the difficult task of reconciling James to the Lords who had been banished to England; and laboured incessantly, though with incomplete success, to compose the unhappy differences which, from private as well as public causes, agitated the great body of the Scottish nobility. In the same spirit too, though not without a secret affection to puritanism, he strove to persuade the King to let the insolence of the preachers of that sect to his crown and person pass with impunity; advising him, says Spotswood, "to leave them to themselves, for they would render themselves ridiculous by their actings, to the people; whereas his Majesty, by imprisoning of them for their undutiful speeches and behaviour, rendered them the object of their compassion." It is not surprising that James should have rejected advice at once so odious to his feelings, and of such doubtful policy.

In the memorable year, 1588, he opened the business of the Parliament which James had called to advise him on the great impending designs of Philip of Spain, with a speech so wise and patriotic, that some of the Scottish historians have preserved the substance of it much at large. He deprecated with warmth all correspondence with Philip; advised that Scotland should be put into the best state of defence; a faithful amity maintained with Elizabeth; and that the utmost military force which could be raised, and safely spared, might be sent to England, should she claim such aid. Among those, however, whom he addressed on that occasion were men not only envious of his power, corrupted by the bribes and promises of Spain, and secretly engaged, Philip was convenient to his designs to land a force in Scotland, to do their best to secure a safe passage for it into the adjoining realm. At the head of these was another Stuart, the lately created Earl of Bothwell, a man of an intriguing and restless disposition, and a most determined enemy to Maitland. Combined with the Earls of Huntley, Errol, and Crawford, he now laid a plan, if a design so extravagant can be properly so called, to seize the person of the King, or the Chancellor, or both, even in the royal palace. The execution, or rather failure, of this enterprise is very obscurely related by the Scottish writers. We are told that the conspirators, aided by several armed men, gained admission into an apartment in which the King was conferring with Maitland, few others being present. That James, having expressed to Huntley, who headed the party, his surprise at their presence, quitted the room, and was presently after followed by the Chancellor, the intruders remaining inactive. It is declared, however, that several persons then with the King, who were his friends to Maitland, threw themselves about his person, and guarded his retreat; and it is probable that from this show of defence the others inferred that their design had been disclosed, and preparations were made to receive them. They left the palace seemingly panic-struck; James, after some show of displeasure, pardoned them for their insolence which they had offered; and they retired to meditate a better digested attack.

Nor was this long deferred. In the spring of 1589 the same noblemen, instigated, say the writers of the time, by the Roman Catholic party, assembled in open insurrection at Aberdeen, when they issued a proclamation, asserting "that the King was kept a prisoner by the Chancellor, and forced, against his mind, to use his nobility with that rigour to which he was naturally averse; and requiring all the lieges to concur with them, and assist them to set his person at liberty." James raised some troops, and marched to meet them. They submitted without striking a blow; were arraigned of high treason, and found guilty; and after a short restraint, the King, to flatter the Catholic party, whose protection he sought against the puritans, granted them a free pardon, Maitland, with a policy amiable in appearance, and prudent in fact, having interceded peculiarly for Bothwell.

While these matters were passing, James formed a resolution to offer his hand to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and on his return to his capital imparted it to his Privy Council, and met with a steady opposition. Elizabeth, determined to thwart every treaty of marriage that he might propose, had secretly gained over a majority of that body to her purpose, and it is impossible to remove from the character of the Chancellor a strong suspicion that he had engaged in forward designs. It is evident that James was of that opinion, for his resentment fell on Maitland alone, and his length arose to such a height, that, having failed in all endeavours to obtain his concurrence, he condescended to employ agents to excite the mob in Edinburgh against the Chancellor, and to induce them to threaten his life, should the marriage be prevented or even delayed. In the mean time his enemies in the Court laboured incessantly in aggravating his offence, and renewing their former accusations; and he seems to have been on the point of ruin, when he extricated himself, apparently by an expedient so simple, and of such doubtful sincerity, that his restoration to favour was more probably ascribed to the King's habitual regard for him. "The Chancellor," says Melvil, who was no friend to him, "being advertised of his Majesty's discontent and displeasure, caused it to come to his Majesty's ears that he would sail himself, and bring the Queen home with him. He forgot not to anoint the hands of some who were most familiar with his Majesty to interpret this his design so favourably that it made the King forget all by-gones; and by little and little he informed him so well of the said voyage, and the great charges he had bestowed upon a fair and swift-sailing ship, that his Majesty was moved to make the voyage himself, and to sail in the same ship with the Chancellor, with great secrecy and short preparation, making no man privy thereto but such as the Chancellor pleased, and such as formerly had all been upon his faction."

They sailed on the twenty-second of October, 1589, and returned not till the twentieth of May. Maitland, who foresaw a storm rising against him at home, availed himself of this long leisure to suggest to James, for his own protection, several novelties in the form of the Scottish government, and in the usages of the Court; meanwhile his enemies in Scotland were not idle, nor had he been able to conceal from the Queen his aversion to her marriage. Anne, on her arrival, naturally enough attached herself to the party which sought his overthrow; and the remainder of his life was passed in fruitless endeavours, by alternate menaces and concessions, to avert the reverse of fortune which seemed to await him. A faction was formed against him among the principal nobility, and the Privy Council charged him with abusing the influence which he had possessed over the King in the undue acquisition of important grants of wealth and power to himself, his family, and his adherents. James, still earnestly attached to him, had barely composed this difference with the Council, when his great enemy Bothwell, who lately escaped from a confinement on the charge of conspiring to compass the King's death by witchcraft, again appeared in arms, and, having published a declaration of his profound loyalty, and that the removal of the Chancellor was the sole object of his enterprise, once more sought the life of that minister at the King's palace and presence. A curious detail of the minute circumstances of this attack, too long to be inserted here, may be found in the Memoirs of Sir James Melvil.

Amidst this warfare on the Chancellor, James raised him to the Peerage: on the eighteenth of May, 1590, he received the title of Baron Maitland of Thirlestane, in Berwickshire. Armed with this proof that he yet enjoyed no small share of royal favour, he seems now first to have courted popularity. He resigned the office of Secretary, his long occupation of which together with the great post of Chancellor had excited much disgust, and soon after prevailed on the King to pass that important statute by which the discipline and jurisdiction of the Kirk were finally legalised and confirmed, in 1592. These conciliations had scarcely been offered when he gave a new offence to the Queen by retaining the possession of an estate which she claimed as a member of the Abbey of Dunfermline, presented to her by the King on their marriage, though Maitland had possessed the lands in question long before that marriage had been even meditated. She now raised a new faction against him in the Court, and he retired, broken down with vexations and disappointments, as well in his private as public affairs, to the country, where he remained most of the year 1593. At length, willing to make a final effort, he resigned the estate; was reconciled, and graciously received by her; and, in endeavouring to ensure her future good-will, unfortunately lent his aid to an intrigue by which she sought to detach the Prince, her son, from the custody of the Earl of Mar, in which, by the single authority and special preference of the King, the infant had been placed. James, suddenly apprised of this scheme, fell into a transport of anger unusual to him. He reprehended the Chancellor with the utmost bitterness; charged him with treachery and ingratitude; and left him hopeless of pardon. He now retired, never to return. On arriving at his seat at Lauder, where he had built a magnificent mansion, he was seized by a fatal illness. James relented, and a letter from him, which the Chancellor received on his death-bed, is still extant, and bears a pleasing testimony to the tenderness of the monarch's disposition. He died on the third of October, 1595, seemingly of the too common disease called a broken heart, and was buried at Haddington, under a magnificent tomb, which displays an epitaph in English verse, the hand of his royal son.

The Chancellor Maitland occasionally relieved his severer studies by poetical composition, some specimens of which have been preserved. A satire written by him, "Aganis Sklanderous Tounis," has been published by Mr. Pinkerton; and several of his epigrams may be found in "Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum." He married Jane, only daughter and heir of James, fourth Earl of Fleming, (who re-married John Kennedy, fifth Earl of Cassilis) and had issue by her John, who succeeded to his dignity, and in 1625 created Viscount and Earl of Lauderdale; and a daughter, Anne, married to Robert Seaton, second Earl of Wintoun.

WILLIAM CECIL,

One can expect in this place a regular and digested detail even of the most prominent facts of ~~any~~ great man's life. The history of his country, and indeed of Europe, teem with the particulars of ~~his~~ political conduct; and though these have been repeatedly condensed, and embodied with much skill and labour, in forms of biography confined exclusively to his story, yet ~~an~~ abundant ~~are~~ the materials, and the theme of such mighty interest, that a life of this minister, combining on an ample scale authentic facts and judicious reasonings, with grace of style, and with that warmth of interest which only a real affection to the subject can bestow, would supply perhaps the most important deficiency in the whole circle of our historical literature. Little more can properly be done here than to collect ~~some~~ fleeting circumstances of ~~his~~ private and domestic conduct: to gather from obscure and neglected sources such as may be obtained of those smaller lights and shadows of character which ~~the~~ affected dignity of history has deemed unworthy of notice.

~~He~~ ~~descended~~ from an ancient and respectable family of country gentlemen which had long been ~~settled~~ in the county of Hereford, a branch of which removed from thence into Lincolnshire, ~~and~~ settled there, in the neighbourhood of Stamford, ~~on~~ considerable estates, purchased by his grandfather, ~~John~~ Siseit, Sitsilt, or Cysmall, for thus variously does his name seem to have been spelled by this individual person. ~~Some~~ attempts were formerly made to trace the origin of his house to ~~show~~ antiquity, for Burghley's foible, and perhaps he had no other, was to assume a credit for splendid ancestry, and he spared no pains in endeavouring to establish the justice of his claim. So predominant in him was this disposition, that he could not help beginning an answer which he penned to some malignant libels on Elizabeth and her ministers with a diffuse account of his own family. ■ may be readily conceived that genealogists and antiquaries were not eager to dispute this point with a prime minister. Verstegan, the first of the latter class in the Treasurer's time, taking an ingenious advantage of the classical aspect of the surname "Cecil," an orthography by the way, which ~~some~~ ■ have been first used by Burghley himself, gravely derives him from a patrician stock of ancient Rome; and others, of less note, who preceded and followed Verstegan, have been even more complaisant. Burghley's genealogical researches, however, ~~were~~ not confined to ■ ~~own~~ views. He loved ■ study, and probably devoted to it most of the little time ■ he could snatch from his great avocations. I once possessed many manuscript pedigrees, written entirely by himself, which a nobleman, lineally descended from him, did me the honour some years since to accept at my hands. Several of them had been compiled with the evident view of discovering illustrious alliances with his own blood. Others were miscellaneous, comprising many families of nobility and gentry in various parts of the kingdom with whom he sought not for such connexion.

He was born on the thirteenth of September, 1520, in the house ■ ■ grandfather, at Bourne, in Lincolnshire, of which parish ■ mother, Jane, daughter and heir of ■ ■ Hickington, was a native. His father, Richard Cecil, was master of the robes to Henry the Eighth. He gained the rudiments ■ his education ■ the free school ■ Grantham, afterwards at Stamford, and ■ the age of fifteen went to St. John's College, in Cambridge. ■ cool and sober mind, ■ ■ disposition for almost unremitting application, which distinguished his public life, were equally conspicuous in his childhood : in his college he rose always at four, and could scarcely ■ prevailed ■ to quit his studies during the whole of ■ day. We are told that he suffered much there from a defluxion ■ his legs, which was ascribed to his sedentary habit, and was cured with difficulty ; but this was probably his first attack of that inveterate gout which so cruelly afflicted his maturer years. His father having destined ■ to the profession of the law, he was entered of Gray's Inn in his twenty-first year, and, about three months after, married Mary, sister of the celebrated scholar Sir John Cheke. A casual disputation with two priests of the Romish Church on some points of doctrine, and of pontifical authority, is said to have introduced him a little before this period to the notice of Henry, who bestowed on him the reversion of an office in one of the courts of law ; and the interest of his brother-in-law, who was preceptor to Edward the Sixth, brought him early in the reign of that Prince into the favour of the Protector. He was appointed Master of Requests, and promoted soon after to the office of Secretary of State ; was displaced, with the rest of Somerset's friends, and committed ■ the Tower, where he remained a prisoner for some months ; and not long before the King's ■ ■ ■ restored by Dudley, who had discovered in him that cool wisdom of which his own intemperate counsels stood so much in need.

Cecil has been taxed with ingratitude, and indeed treachery, to his great patron Somerset, but the charge, which seems to have been grounded on his sudden acquisition of ■ favour ■ Northumberland, acquired ■ credit. Some suspicion, it is true, to ■ effect might probably have been built on the cold consolation which he offered to the Protector when that great man was tottering on the brink of final ruin. ■ solicited an interview with Cecil, then attached to the faction of Dudley ; communicated to him his apprehensions of the impending blow ; and ■ ■ friendly advice. ■ is said to have contented himself with answering that, " if he were innocent, he might trust to that : if he were otherwise, he could only pity him." This anecdote, if it be genuine, furnishes no presumption of treachery. It savours only of the frigid caution which must necessarily attend him who successfully endeavours to rise amidst a conflict of parties. Pure gratitude belongs, almost exclusively, to the intercourse of private society, and Cecil was a statesman by profession ; almost by nature.

Aided by the same useful, however narrow, prudence, he steered with safety through the frightful difficulties which arose on the questionable succession to the Crown upon the death of Edward. When directed by that Prince to prepare the instrument for settling the crown on Jane Grey, he excused himself with evasive address, and shifted the performance of the office on the judges ; and, when the instrument was to be signed by the King, and the Privy Council, contrived, though himself a member of that body, that his name should appear on the face of it only as that of a witness to the royal signature. So, when Northumberland, on the King's demise, called on him to draw the proclamation declaring Jane's accession, and asserting her right to the throne, he excused himself by declining to invade the province of the Attorney and Solicitor General ; and, shortly after, when the fortunes of that rash nobleman and his family were becoming desperate, positively denied his request to compose an argument in support of her title, and the dispositions made by Henry for the exclusion of Mary. Armed with these pleas, from which the best little could be inferred beyond a mere neutrality, he presented himself to that Princess in the very hour which had finally crushed the hopes of Jane, and was graciously received. He prudently took this opportunity to secure himself by a general pardon.

Reserved, mysterious, and perhaps too selfish, in his political views, he preserved, however, a noble integrity in his affection to the religious faith in which he had been bred. When Mary, on her accession, offered to continue him in the post of Secretary if he would conform to the Church of Rome, he stedfastly refused. In a manuscript account of his life, professed to have been written by one of his servants, which possesses much internal evidence of authenticity, we are told that ■■ answered the noble emissary who conveyed to him the Queen's pleasure on that occasion, "that he thought himself bound to serve God first, and next the Queen, but if her service should put him out of God's service, he hoped her Majesty would give him leave to chuse an everlasting rather than a momentary service; and, as for the Queen, she had been his so gracious lady, that he would ever serve and pray for her in his heart, and with his body and goods be as ready to serve in her defence as any of her loyal subjects, so she would please to grant him leave to use his conscience to himself, and serve her ■■ large, as a private man, which he chose rather than to be her greatest counsellor." The same authority informs us that he now commenced a correspondence with Elizabeth in her captivity; communicated to her from time to time all public events in which her interests were concerned; assisted her with his counsels; and thus laid the foundation for that future exalted station in her favour which certainly seems to have rested little less on her personal regard for him than on her conviction of his wisdom and his fidelity.

He was the first person on whom she called for advice, for on the very day of her accession he presented to her minutes of twelve particular matters which required her instant attention, and the first appointment of her reign was to replace him in the office of Secretary. To this, three years after, she added that of Master of the Court of Wards, a post of considerable profit and patronage; on the 25th of February 1570, O. S., created him Baron of Burghley in Lincolnshire; in 1572 gave him the Order of the Garter; and in the autumn of that year he succeeded the old Marquis of Winchester as Lord High Treasurer, and so remained till his death, on the ■■■■ ■■ August 1598, having presided uninterruptedly in the administration of public measures for thirty of the most glorious and happy years that England has ever known.

In every feature of this very eminent person's character we trace some one or more of the qualifications for a great statesman, and in every particular of his public conduct we discover their fruition. ■ burst forth therefore in his youth upon public observation ■ the possession, almost intuitively, ■ those rare faculties which deride the slow march of experience, and scarcely need the protection of power; a fact almost incredible, had we not ourselves of late years witnessed a similar phenomenon. In a remarkable letter of Roger Ascham's, in the year 1550, chiefly on the learning of the English ladies, having spoken largely in the praise of the erudite Mildred Coke, who had then become the second wife of Cecil, he digresses to her husband, at that time in his thirtieth year, and a minister of some years' standing. "It may be doubted," says the translator of Ascham, "whether she is most happy in the possession of this surprising degree of knowledge; or in having had for her preceptor and father Sir Anthony Coke, whose singular erudition caused him to be joined with John Cheke in the office of tutor to the King; or, finally, in having become the wife of William Cecil, lately appointed Secretary of State; a ~~young~~ man indeed, but mature in wisdom, and so deeply skilled both in letters and affairs, and endued with such moderation in the exercise of public offices, that to him would be awarded by the consenting voice of Englishmen the four-fold praise attributed to Pericles by his rival Thucydides—to know all that is fitting; to be able to apply what he knows; to be a lover of his country; and to be superior to money."

Perhaps no better proof of his profound sagacity could be found than in the fact of his having, throughout the unusually protracted term of his administration, enjoyed the uninterrupted confidence and esteem of a Princess whom, if we can for a moment forget our own prejudices and her glory, we shall find little less capricious than her father, and almost as unprincipled. One solitary instance of an apparent suspension of her favour towards him accompanied ■■■ ridiculous disavowal of her intention to sign the death warrant of the unhappy Mary, and the infamous sacrifice of Davison, through which she sought ■■ canonical crime by the commission of another; but this was mere affectation and artifice; he is said to have besought her pardon with a show of the ■■■■ contrition, and received it so speedily that the sincerity of her anger was even at that time doubted.

Burghley, a favourite without the name, was ever an overmatch for the unworthy Leicester, on whom that odious ■■■ was always bestowed. ■■■ fair fame which ■■■■ the one unsought was vainly pursued by the other, and thus will the steady and straightforward step of wisdom and rectitude always outstrip the eager and irregular efforts of cunning and deceit. Flattery seems to have had no share in procuring or maintaining to him the unbounded grace of his mistress, nor can an instance be found of his having used artifice to cultivate ■■■ popularity which he so largely enjoyed. He chastened with so just a judgment a naturally high spirit, and an ample consciousness of the dignity of his rank and place, as to obtain the reverence of many, and the esteem of the whole body, of the nobility, with the exception of a very few, the impotency of whose factious endeavours against him served but to increase ■■■ splendour of ■■■ reputation, and to strengthen the grasp with which he upheld ■■■ honour of the Crown, and the interests ■■ ■■ nation. Though Elisabeth is said to have ruled by the dexterous opposition of parties, she ever abstained from involving him in the collision. Indeed there is good reason to suppose that he joined her in the prosecution of this policy, and, by affecting a careless neutrality, increased the vain hopes ■■ faction, and encouraged ■■ to disclose its views. ■■ the long course of his ministry, history records not a single instance of erroneous judgment; of persecution, or even severity, for ■■■ public or private cause; of indecorous ambition, ■■ ■■■■ of wealth ; of haughty insolence, or mean submission. In a word, moderation, the visible sign of a moral sense critically just, was the guide of all his actions ; decorated the purity of his religious faith with charity to his opponents, and tempered the sincere warmth of his affection to the Crown with a due regard to all the civil institutions of the realm ; it has been therefore happily said of him, that " he loved to wrap the prerogatives in the laws of the land."

The same fine principle coloured the whole conduct of his private life. Without remarkable fondness or indulgence, he was the kindest husband, father, and master, among the great men of his time ; with few professions of regard, a warm friend ; a steady enemy, with passive resentment ; a cheerful, and even jocular companion, with cautious familiarity ; just in all his dealings, without ostentation ; magnificent in his establishments, without profusion ; tenacious of the powers and privileges of his own high station, and tenderly careful of the rights of others. His two marriages, in both of which he was singularly fortunate, have been already mentioned. It is scarcely necessary to say that the Marquis of Exeter is lineally descended from the first, and the Marquis of Salisbury from the second. His second lady brought him likewise two daughters ; Anna, who became the wife of Edward de Vere, eighteenth Earl of Oxford ; and Elizabeth, married to William, eldest son of Thomas Lord Wentworth.

ESSEX DEVEREUX,

EARL OF ESSEX

THAT incomparable Essex, who was the second Earl of his family ; the great favourite of Elizabeth, and of England ; the admiration and the regret of Europe. In an age certainly inquisitive ; at least pretending to exquisite taste and judgment ; and peculiarly distinguished by its incessant and various employment of arms, it is astonishing that no regular and detailed celebration should have been dedicated to the memory of this very extraordinary man. We have been gorged, even to disgust, with tedious pieces of unmerited biography, and the actions and motives of plodding statesmen, insignificant courtiers, and rebels who resembled Essex in nothing but in their rank and their punishment, have been sifted and analysed with the most insufferable minuteness ; while a few inestimable memorials of a character, the exquisite perfections and errors of which were almost peculiar to itself, have been suffered to remain scattered and unconnected on the pages of history, or buried in undisturbed manuscript. How can we account for this omission ? Have fear and modesty deterred modern biographers from venturing on a task to perform which worthily the pen must sometimes be dipped in the softest milk of human kindness, and sometimes into the burning fermentation of furious passions ; or must we ascribe it to a submission, less excusable, to the depraved taste of a time in which history is chiefly devoted to the discovery of political analogies, and to the suggestion his charge with a heart overflowing with kindness [REDACTED] gratitude. Towards the [REDACTED] of the year 1578, [REDACTED] Essex, by the direction of Lord Burghley, became a student of Trinity College, in Cambridge. Whitgift, afterwards Primate, who [REDACTED] of that house, undertook the direction [REDACTED] education, and here the character and powers [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] presently unfolded: his obedient application to the severer orders of learning was not [REDACTED] remarked than [REDACTED] attachment to more polite studies, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] was distinguished for [REDACTED] elegance [REDACTED] fluency of composition [REDACTED] which [REDACTED] time afforded few instances. His manners [REDACTED] peculiarly engaging; his temper mild, compliant, and marked by a graceful seriousness which approached to melancholy; his moral conduct stained by no vice, and becomingly tinged with dignity. He remained in the University till 1582, when he took the degree of Master of Arts, and soon after [REDACTED] into South Wales, where he [REDACTED] in one of his family mansions, and became, says Wotton, so enamoured of a rural life, that it required much persuasion to withdraw him from his retirement.

In 1584 he [REDACTED] at length to Court, introduced and patronised by his father-in-law, Leicester, who [REDACTED] then in [REDACTED] of [REDACTED] power. It [REDACTED] been strongly rumoured that Leicester caused [REDACTED] late Earl's death by poison. [REDACTED] [REDACTED] married [REDACTED] widowed Countess with indecent haste, and perhaps [REDACTED] sought to lessen [REDACTED] suspicion under which he laboured by thus publicly professing his affection for the son. It has been [REDACTED] that Essex was inclined [REDACTED] reject his prof- [REDACTED] friendship; we find, however, that in the succeeding year, [REDACTED] accompanied Leicester, then appointed Captain- [REDACTED] [REDACTED] Low Countries, to Holland, where, though little more [REDACTED] eighteen years old, he received the commission of General of the Horse. [REDACTED] was distinguished in that campaign by his personal bravery, especially [REDACTED] the battle [REDACTED] Zutphen, [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the twenty-seventh of December, 1587, shortly after [REDACTED] return, was suddenly elevated [REDACTED] [REDACTED] dignified post ■ Master of the Horse. In the following year, when Elizabeth assembled an army to await at the mouth ■ the Thames the awful attack threatened by Spain ; when superior military skill, to direct the bravery of her troops, was perhaps even more important than the wisdom of her ministers to the support of a crown which was then thought by many to totter on her head ; she chose this youth to command her horse, and decorated him with that splendid order ■ knighthood which she had frequently ■ the best and the noblest of her old servants. Thus far he seemed to common observers to have been borne forward on the wing of Leicester's power, or rather till this period had Elizabeth been able to conceal that extravagant partiality which presently after astonished all Europe, and still remains perhaps the most remarkable paradox in English history.

Leicester died in the autumn of that year, and Essex instantly rose to a measure of favour which that extraordinary man, whose influence over the Queen had been so long envied, never enjoyed. ■ was unsought by himself. It pursued him. It seemed even to molest him, by interrupting the course of his inclinations, and confining his ardent and independent spirit to spheres of action which, though the amplest that a monarch could offer, were too narrow for its rapid and eccentric range. Even so early as the spring of 1589 he fled, unpermitted, from the Court, and sailed to Portugal with Norris and Drake, a volunteer in the expedition then undertaken for the restoration of Don Antonio to the throne of that kingdom. The degree of anger to which Elizabeth was provoked by this extravagant step, and by his disobedience to a previous summons, may be best inferred from the letter by which she commanded his instant return.

■ Essex,

"Your sudden and unadvised departure from our presence, and your place of attendance, you may easily conceive how offensive it is, and ought to be, unto us. ■ great favours bestowed upon you, without deserts, hath drawn you thus to neglect and forget your duty, for other construction we cannot make of these your strange actions. meaning therefore to tolerate this your disordered part, we gave directions to some of our Privy Council, to let you know our express pleasure for your immediate repair hither, which you have performed, as your duty doth bind you, increasing thereby greatly your former offence, and undutiful behaviour, departing such sort without our privity, having so special offices of attendance and charge near our person. We do therefore charge and command you forthwith, upon the receipt of these our letters, all excuses and delay apart, to make your present and immediate repair unto us, understand our farther pleasure ; whereof see you fail not, as you will be loth to incur our indignation, and will answer for the contrary at your uttermost peril.

" The 15th of April, 1589."

Essex length presented himself, and these threats were revoked. He returned not to inquiry and punishment, but to renewed grace. The gallantry with which he had fought in every action during his absence, was thrown by Elizabeth into the scale of his merits, and the counterpoise forgotten. Elizabeth admired brave men ; and yet it has been observed that when, about this time, Essex, in a sudden fit of jealousy of her favour, had affronted Sir Charles Blount, afterwards Lord Montjoy, because he had decorated his person with a jewel which the Queen had given to him, and had been therefore challenged, and wounded in a duel, by that gentleman swore, with great seeming wrath, that " unless some one or other should take him down, there would be no ruling him." There can be little doubt that this speech meant disguise her real sentiments. Such a favourite as Essex could not have offended a woman of her character by contending for her good graces. His marriage, however, which shortly followed these events, did indeed provoke her resentment ■■■ without; ■■■ here ■■■ the same feelings ■■■ her to dissemble : she ascribed her anger to the alleged inequality of the match, by which she alleged that the honour of ■■■ Earl's house was degraded—degraded by his having married the daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham, and relict of Sir Philip Sidney !

■■■ Now he was appointed to the command of a force of four thousand troops, sent by Elizabeth to ■■■ Henry the Fourth of France in the siege of Rouen. The object of this expedition was wholly disconcerted by the tardy co-operation ■■■ French. Essex, however, distinguished himself by a chivalrous gallantry in many skirmishes, and, after an absence of some months, returned, highly disgusted because the greatest captain of the age had declined his advice on a military question. He was received with unabated kindness by the Queen, who now admitted him into her Privy Council, but it is at this period, as perhaps might naturally ■■■ expected, that historians have ■■■ the commencement of his discontent. His captivating talents, his unbounded liberality, his courtesy, and ■■■ courage, had rendered him the idol of all warm and generous hearts ; while the selfish and the needy crowded round him, and loaded him with adulation, in the hope of sharing the fruits ■■■ his unbounded influence ■■■ ■■■ The younger nobility, and the military, looked ■■■ to him with mixed motives of ■■■ and interest, and considered him at once their example and their patron ; the Puritans, now becoming a formidable body, arrogantly claimed his protection as a duty which had devolved on him from his father-in-law, Leicester, who ■■■ openly favoured ■■■ doctrines and their pretensions ; ■■■ the ■■■ of other classes courted him with unceasing assiduity, in ■■■ view of, ■■■ time, availing themselves ■■■ that discord with the Queen or her servants, into which the simplicity of his heart, and the eagerness of his temper, were so likely to betray him. ■■■ enormous popularity ■■■ length excited in secret the fears of Elizabeth, and increased the jealousy already raised in the breasts of her ministers by the favours that she had bestowed on him. She sought to avert her danger by furnishing incessant employment to his activity and love of glory, and they laboured to drive him to desperation by schemes to render his services abortive.

These passions were beginning to operate when, in June, 1596, he undertook, jointly with the High Admiral Howard, the command of the expedition to Cadiz. The particulars of this and of his excursions in the succeeding year, are so largely given by our historians, that it would be impertinent to repeat them here. It is worthy, however, of observation, that in the former opinion was always uniformly rejected, save only as to the proper moment for attacking the Spanish fleet in the harbour, the Admiral's concession to which was so joyfully received by him, that, in an ecstasy, he threw his hat into the sea. The Island Voyage, as it was called, in 1597, in which he acted as commander-in-chief both of the army and fleet, was unhappily distinguished by his differences with Raleigh, who served as Rear-Admiral, the origin and circumstances of which have been variously and contradictorily represented by different writers; and yet, amidst this confusion, strong grounds appear to suspect Raleigh of a premeditated design to prevent the success of the enterprise. Essex, on his arrival from Cadiz, had been better received by the Queen than by her ministers, whom he found inclined to censure every part of his conduct in the expedition. He published, therefore, a narrative of it, more for sincerity than prudence, in which, as has been well observed, "he set down whatever was omitted in the prosecution of it, and then, by way of answer to those objections, imputed all miscarriages to other men; by which he raised to himself many implacable enemies, and did not gain one friend." At the same time his attempts to use his influence for the service of his friends, which indeed seems to have been the end to which he wished always to apply it, were constantly thwarted. He was now deeply mortified, and Elizabeth, who seems to have shared in his chagrin, endeavoured to console him by a gift for life of the post of Master of the Ordnance, to which he was appointed on the nineteenth of March, 1597. New causes, however, of dissatisfaction arose. During his absence on the Island Voyage the Admiral, Howard, had been created Earl of Nottingham, and in his patent the reduction of Cadiz was ascribed to his good service. This affront, as Essex, and perhaps rightly, conceived it, together with his vexation at the moderate success of that expedition, produced in him a disgust which became publicly visible. On his return, he retired to the country, and, according to the fashion of that time, pleaded illness to excuse his attendance in Parliament, which was then sitting. Elizabeth again interfered to appease him, and on the twenty-eighth of December, 1597, raised him to the splendid office of Earl Marshal of England.

His services, or rather his endeavours to serve, were now transferred to the Council, and he appeared in the character of a statesman, for which he possessed every qualification but patience. Here he opposed, with equal vehemence and good argument, the proposals offered in May, 1598, for a treaty of amity with Spain. On this great topic he engaged in disputes with the Treasurer, Burghley, which rose to such warmth that Burghley, at the council table, drew a prayer-book from his bosom, and prophetically pointed out to the Earl this passage—"Men of blood shall not live out half their days." Peace was determined on; and Essex, in his dread of being misrepresented, to the abatement of that popularity his affection to which was his greatest fault and misfortune, immediately composed his "Apology against those which falsely and maliciously take him to be the only hindrance of the peace and quiet of their country, addressed to his friend Anthony Bacon." This exquisite example of his talents and integrity, as well as of the purity and elegance of his style, infinitely valuable too as it exhibits a sketch by his own hand of the circumstances of his public conduct to that period, was soon after printed, doubtless at least with his concurrence, to the great offence of the Queen. Burghley, ■■■ ancient guardian, whose power had in ■■■ ■■■■ warded off the attacks of his enemies, and to the wisdom and ■■■■ of whose advice ■■■ impetuosity ■■■ frequently submitted, ■■■ ■■■ ■■■ ■■■ preparing his Apology, and ■■■ fell into new errors and excesses. Among these the most remarkable occurred in his memorable and well-known quarrel with Elizabeth on the choice of a Governor for Ireland, which terminated on his part with the grossest personal insult ever offered by a subject to a sovereign, and on ■■■ by manual chastisement. He fled to hide his rage in the most obscure retirement, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he could be prevailed on to acknowledge his fault. The wise and worthy Lord Keeper Egerton, in addressing to him a long letter of gentle remonstrance, uses ■■■■ persuasions—"If you ■■■ hold this course, which hitherto you find to be worse and worse (and the longer you go, the further you go out of the way), there is little hope or likelihood the end will be better. You are not yet gone so far but that you may well return. The return is safe, but the progress is dangerous and desperate in this course you hold. If you have any enemies, you ■■■ that for them which they could ■■■■ do for themselves; your friends you leave to scorn and contempt. You forsake yourself, and overthrow your fortunes, and rainate your honour and reputation. You give that comfort and courage to the foreign enemies as greater they cannot have; for what can be more welcome and pleasing news ■■■■ to hear that ■■■ Majesty and the realm are maimed of so worthy a member, who hath so often and so valiantly quailed ■■■■ daunted them? You forsake your country when ■■■ hath most need of your counsel and aid: and, lastly, you fail in your indissoluble duty which you owe unto your most gracious Sovereign; a duty imposed on you, not by ■■■■ ■■■ policy only, but by the religious and sacred bond wherein the

Divine Majesty of Almighty God hath by the rule of Christianity obliged you."

Essex's reply presents perhaps the truest picture extant not only of his natural but of his political character; of the grandeur of his mind, and of the tyranny of his passions; of his habitual loyalty, and his republican inclinations. In this admirable letter we find the following vivacious expressions of defiance—"When the vilest of all indignities are done unto me, doth religion enforce me to sue? Doth God require it? Is it impiety not to do it? Why? Cannot Princes err? Cannot subjects receive wrong? Is an earthly power absolute? Pardon me, pardon me, my Lord; I can never subscribe to these principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh when he is stricken. Let those that mean to make their profit of Princes shew to have no sense of Princes' injuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite absoluteness on earth that do not believe an infinite absoluteness in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong! I feel it: My cause is good; I know it: and, whatsoever comes, all the powers on earth can never shew more strength or constancy in oppressing than I can shew in suffering whatsoever can or shall be imposed on me." Essex at length persuaded to make a proud submission, and was again received into Elizabeth's favour, which seemed even yet to have been but little impaired.

The affairs of Ireland appear indeed to have been at that time Essex's favourite political study. He frequently, in the debates of the council, complained of an unreasonable parsimony with which he charged the Ministers in the government of the country, and of restrictions by which they had long fettered the faculties of the Queen's Deputies. His enemies determined to avail themselves of this disposition, and to tempt him by an offer of that important and honourable post, with unusually enlarged authority, and command of a more numerous army than had ever been sent thither. To conquer rebellious factions; to civilize a people once barbarous and generous; to administer strict justice through the means of absolute power ; were noble objects in the view of one whose character united, with a haughty and courageous spirit, the mildest humanity and the ~~most~~ moral principles. Prudence too, if ~~he~~ ever used it, now perhaps reminded him that anger is best cooled by absence, and that past errors are frequently forgotten in the grateful sense of new services. He accepted the office, however, with reluctance and disgust, unless we are to consider the following exquisite little epistle to Elizabeth, which is said, I know not on what ground, to have been written between the dates of his appointment and his departure, merely as a general appeal to her feelings, and a strong effort to regain the fulness of her favour, for which he made his commission to Ireland the pretext.

" From a mind delighting in sorrow ; from spirits wasted with passion ; from a heart torn in pieces with care, grief, and travel ; from a man that hateth himself, and all things else that keep him alive ; what service can your Majesty expect, since any service past deserves ~~me~~ more than banishment and proscription to the curstest of all islands ! It is your rebels' pride and success must give me leave to ransom myself out of this hateful prison ; out of my loathed body ; which, if ~~it~~ happen so, your Majesty shall have no cause ~~to~~ mislike the fashion of my death, since the course of my life could never please you.

" Happy he could finish forth his fate
~~In~~ some unhaunted desert, most obscure
 From all society, from love and hate
 Of worldly folk ; then should he sleep secure ;
 Then wake again, and yield God ever praise ;
 Content ~~with~~ hips, and haws, and bumbleberry,
 In contemplation passing out his days,
 And change of holy thoughts to make him merry ;
 Who when he dies his tomb may be a bush,
 Where harmless Robin dwells with gentle Thrush.

" Your Majesty's exiled servant,

" HOWARD ESSEX."

On the twenty-seventh of March, 1599, he left London, on his way towards Ireland, to the great joy of those who had thus freed themselves of his unwelcome presence to place him amidst perils which they well knew how to increase. His efforts, however, were needless. The short term of his government was a tissue of imprudence, confusion, and misfortune. He passed the first two months in making journeys of observation, and plans for action, and laid the fruits of those labours before the Queen at large in a letter of consummate ability. Elizabeth alighted his opinions, and blamed his conduct in the very first military enterprise which he undertook. During the irritation produced by these crosses, a large body of his troops was worsted by the Irish, and he punished the remainder of the detachment, contrary to his nature, with a frightful severity. He undertook an unsuccessful expedition, contrary to the Queen's express order to march his army into another province, and afterwards, in obeying that order, was yet more unfortunate. He demanded reinforcements, and obtained them; marched in person, at the head of his main army, to attack the rebels, under the command of Tir-oen; and, without striking a blow, concluded a disgraceful treaty with that chieftain. His incessant solicitude at that period on the designs of his enemies in England, seems to have been either the cause or the consequence of a degree of actual insanity which never after left him. He formed a serious resolution to return with his army, and to employ it in subduing them, and it was with great difficulty that some of his dearest friends succeeded in dissuading him from that monstrous attempt. Shortly after, on receiving a reproachful letter from the Queen, he suddenly quitted Ireland, almost alone, and travelling with the utmost speed, appeared most unexpectedly in her presence at Nonsuch, on the twenty-eighth of September, 1599, and implored her to listen to his apology.

Elizabeth was touched by the singular character of this appeal, which once more excited in some degree her tenderness, while it flattered her pride. Essex, once so beloved;

whose disobedience she had threatened with condign punishment; whose rebellious resistance she had been taught to anticipate; instead of persisting in his contumacy; or standing aloof to treat for pardon; or employing friends to intercede on his behalf; had fled from an army which adored him, and crossed the sea, to throw himself singly on her mercy and her wisdom. She received him with complacency, and admitted him to a long conference, in the conclusion of which he commanded her to quit her apartment in the Court, and soon after committed him to an honourable, though close confinement in the house of the Lord Keeper. It is probable that, had matters been left wholly to her undisturbed decision, he might even now have escaped with very light penalties, but another powerful passion had been awakened in her breast, and, terrified at the representations which were every hour laid before her of the dangers to be apprehended from his popularity and his violence, she consented at length to leave his case to the Privy Council, before which it had been somewhat agitated immediately after his arrival. He remained long a prisoner, occasionally encouraged, and with Elizabeth's connivance, to hope that no more was intended than to humble his spirit, and that he might be again restored to her grace; till, on the fifth of June, 1600, he was brought publicly before the Council, and, after an examination of eleven hours, for the most part of which he was kept kneeling, it was determined that he should be deprived of his seat in that body, and of all his offices, except that of Master of the Horse, and remain in custody during the Queen's pleasure. He was finally enlarged on the twenty-seventh of the following August, and retired to one of his seats in the country.

The die was now cast. Essex considered his situation to be desperate, and that conceit effectually rendered so. At the beginning of the winter he returned to London, and his house became not only the resort but the residence of the idle, the profligate, and dissipated of all ranks. Cuffe, who had been his secretary in Ireland, a man of considerable talents, rendered useless, or worse, like his own, by an impetuous temper, undertook to execute his plans, if they deserved to be so. Few circumstances of our history are better known than those which compose the sad sequel of Essex's story. He seems to have conceived the extravagant, and utterly impracticable design of working simultaneously on the affection and the fears of Elizabeth. Declaring his profound loyalty, and the most earnest personal regard, he armed his little band professedly to force her to hear his grievances, and to dismiss her servants. Terrified perhaps, but still interested in his favour, instead of employing the ample means to reduce him which were in her power, she ordered that he should be summoned before her Council, and he disobeyed. The next morning she sent the Lord Keeper, the Lord Chief Justice, and others of the Council, to his house, to receive his complaints, and he imprisoned them. He then sallied forth, at the head of his adherents, and sought ineffectually for volunteers in the city; returned by the river, and fortified his house; and, when no means remained to save him from the perdition to which he seemed to have devoted himself, was at length proclaimed a traitor, besieged, and taken prisoner. These strange circumstances occurred on the seventh and eighth of February, 1601, N.S.; and on the nineteenth, he was brought to his trial before the Peers, and condemned to die. Of his treason there could be no doubt, for he had been committed in the sight of thousands; but for his motives, saving the simple impulse of a most fiery and imprudent spirit, we can look only to his own declaration, that his first object was to gain access to the Queen's person, and his final view, to the establishment of the succession in the King of Scots; for the charge preferred against him of a secret design to set up a claim to the crown on his own part, in right of a remote maternal descent from the House of York, is utterly incredible. The Queen was anxious to the last to spare his life. Of the well known, but weakly authenticated tale ■■■ Countess of Nottingham, and ■■■ ring, with which many writers have been ■■■ of amplifying the last scene of this tragedy, I will say nothing ; ■■■ otherwise sufficient proof that ■■■ length ■■■ way to the importunities of her ministers with the ■■■ reluctance, and signed ■■■ warrant for ■■■ execution amidst a dreadful conflict of tenderness, resentment, and terror. ■■■ death ■■■ the sixth day after his trial, with a piety not less modest than fervid, and a magnanimity ■■■ heroic.

■■■ historical characters, ■■■ of Essex ■■■ generally been deemed the ■■■ difficult ■■■ justly estimated. ■■■ and singular indeed was ■■■ construction, but surely not mysterious. The faults of those who deserve to be called good and great usually spring from an exuberance of fine qualities. All the errors of this extraordinary person may be traced to the warmth of his heart, or the noble simplicity of his mind ; to his courage, to his friendships, to ■■■ exact sense of honour, or his exalted love of truth. With ■■■ virtues, joined to admirable talents, he ■■■ perhaps the most unfit ■■■ living to be trusted with the direction of important affairs, either civil or military, for his candour disqualified him for the cabinet, and his rashness for the field. ■■■ weighed the purity of his intentions against the motives of other public servants with accuracy and justice, and ■■■ with which he proclaimed the result rendered them his mortal enemies ; but he rated his services, and perhaps ■■■ powers, too highly ; and hence his frequent quarrels with Elizabeth, the ■■■ extent of whose favour and bounty he seems never to have considered as commensurate to his deserts ; ■■■ occasional insolence to that Princess was therefore the ■■■ of pride, and not of ingratitude. His resentment ■■■ marked by a petulance somewhat inconsistent with genuine dignity, and ■■■ friendships ■■■ always worthily placed ; but he was ■■■ capricious, for his affections and his aversions were unalterable, and he was incapable of disguising either sentiment : in following the dictates of the one, his liberality knew no bounds ; in the gratification of the other, his generosity was never sallied by a single instance of private revenge. His domestic conduct seems to have been unexceptionable. In his hours of retirement his impetuosity was soothed by the consolations of sincere piety and conscious innocence ; by the love of his family, and his dependants, who idolised him ; by the temperate charms of refined conversation and reflection. In the humble sincerity of his dying moments he had no moral offences to avow but certain amorous frailties of his youth.

His understanding was of the sort which usually accompanies acute feelings ; quick, penetrating, versatile ; admirable in its conceptions, but of uncertain execution ; sometimes approaching, sometimes out-reaching, but seldom resting at, that sober and wary point of judgment which in worldly men is dignified by the title of wisdom. His acquirements were infinitely varied and extended. It will appear on an examination of those of his writings which have been fortunately left to us, that his studies, or rather his perceptions, had embraced every usual object of human science. His powers of expression were equal to the measure of his knowledge : indeed he was incomparably the English prose writer of his time, and it has been lately discovered that in Latin composition he fell nothing short of the best classical models. The present age, too, busy in such researches, has brought to light several poems, of various characters, which reflect a new and unexpected lustre on his genius. He was the man, and so designed by nature to inform, to improve, and to delight society, whom his own ambition, and his talents, fully, misplaced in his characters as a statesman, a general, and a courtier.

On the extravagance of the Queen's favour to him as a nobleman and the motives by which he was dictated, it is unnecessary here to dilate. Lord Orford, in his "Royal and Noble Authors," has treated at large of those matters, with such acuteness of reasoning, and such extent of historical knowledge, any attempt to elucidate this singular subject would be vain and presumptuous. I shall therefore only add that the Earl of Dewe married, as has been before stated, Frances, daughter and heir of Sir Francis Walsingham, and widow of Sir Philip Sidney, by whom he had an only son, Robert, who was the last Earl of the family of Devereux; and two daughters; Frances, married to William Seymour, Earl of Hertford, afterwards Duke of Somerset; Dorothy, wife, first, of Sir Henry Shirley, of ~~Leicester~~ Harold, in Leicestershire, Bart., secondly, to ~~John~~ Stafford, of Blatherwick, in the county of Northampton.

SECRET

EXCEPT FOR STAFF, FOREIGN, INTERNAL.

